Break

On the way up?

When Willy Reid leaves the DES finance branch at the end of the month to go home to Scotland and lead the Scottish Office into its expected new role servicing the Scottish Assembly, another round of departmental musical chairs will take place.

John Thompson, his deputy, will be promoted to Under-Secretary in charge of schools branch 1 to take over from Richard Jameson, who moves across into the accountant general slot vacated by Reid.

This archaic title does not call for a cost accountant but for an under-secretary who is probably on the way up. The advantages of the job, if you like that sort of thing, are that it gives you a finger in every pie, since it covers all the annual cycle of public spending on education from the RSG to the UGC. The disadvantage, if you are not quick on your feet, is that you can become a punch-bag between the Treasury on the one side and the spending branches of the department on the other.

Richard Jameson, who has had an earlier spell as deputy in the finance branch, is not unduly dismayed by the prospect. He might in fact be thought to be well prepared all round for the role since he has been at the department man and boy since he came down from university in 1952. In those days it was called the Ministry of Education and Florence Horsbrugh was the minister.

Altogether he has served under 13 ministers and picks out two as the most impressive: David Eccles for his achievements and Anthony Crosland because of his stimulating effect on civil servants.

"He'd thought a lot about the theory of education and written books, and he wanted to put it into practice. He conducted discussion like university seminars, expected officials to keep up with him and always spotted, irrelevance or non sequitors. You had to keep your wits about you on Sundays at home too, because he sometimes telephoned for a quick answer."

Even so, Jameson agrees that the education debate is usually blander, more muffled, than some of the political scene outside, which he tasted in three short spells away from the department—once as secretary to the Robbins Committee, twice in the Cabinet Office. His first stint there was in the Macmillan era, when he was in the secretariat at an early Rhodesia conference, which Dr Banda broke up by sweeping our shouting "To hell with federation". Not the sort of excitement you get at the DES.

His next secondment was at the special request of Ted Short, who wanted one of his former trusty DES colleagues to help him run the Common Market referendum, which really meant helping to draft the Bill and questions. "A very hectic, bizarre and highly political episode."

Even without such outside excursions, Richard Jameson has regularly impressed as the sort of civil servant who is prepared to leave his desk and find out for himself, making frequent visits to schools and sounding out opinion on contentious issues.

For his last two years in charge of schools branch, a fair slice of his time has been spent in seeing through the 1976 Education Act—through its launching, the extended talking shop of the committee stages, and the mopping up operation that is now going on with l.e.a.s. still reluctant to go fully comprehensive. (For the record, his own children do go to their local comprehensive.)

He leaves at a rather more unfinished stage his branch's work on sixth form size and organization, early feelors having brought down so much hostility. The problem of the post-16s may still be soluble, but as Anthony Crosland said, "Always spread out your rows".

Richard Jameson — sidestepping the punches.

More moral than we think . . .

On Sunday night BBC television's further education department kicks off a new series dedicated to showing viewers that they are more moral than they sometimes think. This proposition does not, of course, imply anything very complimentary to the human race: Professor Bernard Williams, who is to present the 10 weekly instalments of Dilemmas (BBC 1), is concerned to prove to those with ears to hear that even our most impulsive and instinctive actions take place in a moral framework of some kind.

This Sunday's dilemma is common enough—"should I tell a lie to help a friend?"—but it is presented in a way which should appeal poignantly to readers of this newspaper. A group of 13-year-olds from a Gosport comprehensive act out the roles of interviewer and referee and then justify their decision whether or not to divulge the criminal record of a friend who is applying for a responsible job.

These little charades, which were apparently unrehearsed, should be prescribed viewing for all those who are struggling to offer their CSE classes ethics with a human face. Those who are not engaged in this noble endeavour will at least be seduced by the Young Visiter-like candour with which these timeless moral calculations are expressed.

The second week's dilemma should also be of interest to those in loco parentis: "How important is sex?" I can reveal that on this programme our reviewer, Robert Shields, gets more than a little irritated with a permissive radio doctor, and that some unorthodox approaches to sex are cogently defended by those who live by them.

A subsequent dilemma is even more up this paper's street. Faced with the question of whether teaching jobs should in some areas be given to black applicants in preference to white (even if the latter are slightly better qualified academically), our reviewer, Professor Antony Flew (who says no) waxes irate in the face of blandly confident opposition from Professor Ronald Dworkin.

On each occasion, it should be said, Professor Williams nudges the antler-locking process along with considerable aplomb. His other current task—chairing the Committee on Obscenity and Film Censorship—seems to be standing him in good stead.

Redbridge ritual

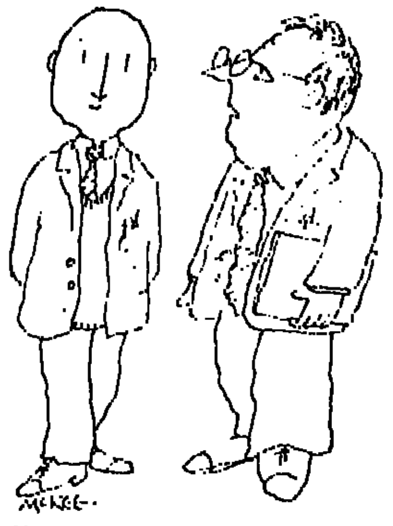
The drastic decision to issue orders under Section 99 of the Education Act 1944 for the first time against rebel l.e.a.s Redbridge and Sutton was not taken lightly at the Department of Education and Science.

In the first place DES officials and lawyers solemnly conferred with Treasury counsel, and representatives from the Attorney General's and Treasury Solicitor's offices, to make sure there should be no slip-ups such as occurred when Section 68 was wielded to enforce comprehensive plans by law.

With the legal ends tied up, the real fun began. Since Section 99 had never been used a ritual was devised, with due solemnity, for the presentation of the orders.

First, they were drawn up on imposing scrolls of parchment, the pages bound together with green ribbon and green sealing wax, the red seal of the DES at the end. Shirley Williams agreed to sign them herself, rather than leave it to officials who had conducted previous correspondence.

Then, arrangements were made to deliver them by hand, by special appointment with chief executive or chief education officer. Last Thursday night the two DES officials who lived nearest to Redbridge and Sutton took the orders home, and next morning waited at the town hall. Only when it was known that the orders had been duly delivered on Friday did the official announcement go out—at midday.



Voucher system indeed. Green Shield have a lot to answer for.

Flush of youth

It seems like only yesterday that the voluntary youth lobby was bawling out the Manpower Services Commission for using the youth unemployment programme to multiply its own staff.

Since it has later become clear that the MSC is more likely to have too few bureaucrats to run its youth programme than too many, the youth people have changed their tune. As well they might.

For now a little Government money has come the way of the youth organizations themselves, to spend on related projects, and in a flush the youth industry has taken off as well. Last week the public appointments pages displayed prominent advertisements for five new jobs in the £4,000-£5,000 a year bracket.

The National Youth Bureau—"the national resource centre and forum for youth affairs and social education of young people"—is looking for someone to head its Young Volunteer Resources Unit. Whoever wins this challenging and exciting post "developing a team approach to servicing" young people's community involvement programmes, will head a group of six workers and join the bureau's management team.

The NYB also wants to recruit for two "new challenging and demanding" posts of development officer and information officer in its Youth Opportunities Development Unit. This new unit (the head is already appointed) is being funded by the MSC itself to help monitor their youth opportunities gramme.

The British Youth Council given a grant of £14,000 by in March to spend on politi cation and promoting youth pation generally.

Now it is looking for a national officer (it also Foreign Office grant) and an tion officer who will produce local materials for the education programme. App under 26 preferred.

Of course all these people like the MSC, will be thoroughly worthwhile jobs Peter Mandelson's letter on of the BYC in last week's TES the youth organizations will be their own little bit to relieve ployment. But somehow the with which they are building own bureaucracy and slipping easily into the language of ment seems inappropriate for ful pressure groups.

Ode on a tape recorder

There was quite a jolly prize at the Hilton Hotel this week 1978 3M Young Poet Awards poems were generally as guished as the hats but one were at least entertaining: pus Vulgaris", "The Teacher" "Graffiti after Sundown" which the punchline was: like plain crisps". Others were petent but derivative. Winners made tape recordings of their which were played at the giving, all sounded desper Radio Four.

Alisdair Aston, of the ILEA lish inspectorate, summed judging and spoke of talent variety and of the improvement the standards shown in years. He also said he wished of the many critics of modern cation could have read the poems which were entered for competition, not only written schoolchildren but also recorded them.

The star attraction was Pam Ayres but she proved a appointing. She said that 3M hoped she would write a poem the occasion (so had we all) couldn't think of one, and came across with two lines gerel ending "3M have taped". Pam also said she extremely impressed, and and in favour of encouraging people to write things "because fun". So we all went off on yet more battery on

Fun with Numbers

If the digits of the chosen number were x, y, z, the number was 100x+10y+z. The other five numbers with these digits are found by permuting x, y, z. The sum of the six numbers is 200(x+y+z) + 20(x+y+z) + 2(x+y+z=222(x+y+z). But 222= 6×37. y+z)=222(x+y+z. But 222=6×37. So the result is always 1.

What comes next? (a) 1, 2, 4, 7, 11, 16. The differences between consecutive terms form the sequence of natural numbers, 1, 2, 3, 4. (b) 10, 17. n²−2n+2. (c) 17, 29, 49. Yes, 69 is the 7th term. (d) Each term is the sum of the two previous terms, so the next three terms are 29, 47, 76. In a sequence of this kind the first two numbers are not related to each other. Similar sequences can be made by choosing any two numbers to start with. The most famous sequence of this kind is the Fibonacci series that starts with two ones; 1, 1, 2, 3, 5, 8, etc.

Berkshire backs down now looks as if Berkshire have backed ay from a confrontation with their teaers and with the Society of Education ficers over the appointment of a chief ucation officer to succeed the present O, Mr R. J. Hornsby.

When the job of "Director of Education rvices" was advertised in The Times d the TES on April 28, it aroused immeate suspicion. There was no reference to owledge or experience of the education rvice; only to "substantial managerial perience". Study of the particulars of e appointment sent out to applicants inforced the original doubts with the llowing sentence: "It will be noted m the above advertisement that applitions are invited from persons of any levant managerial experience and is (c) not necessarily confined to persons th a professional educational background."

The secretary of the Berkshire NUT, r Harry Rose, who happens also to be teacher member of the county education committee, fired off a letter to Mrs hirley Williams, the Secretary of State r Education, asking her to prevent any unsuitable appointment". It would e her duty to act if someone was appoind who was not a "fit person" within e meaning of the Act. (Mrs Williams's tervention in Avon is believed to have een one reason why that authority modiied the conditions of the CEO's appointent).

Both Mr Rose and Mr Brian Williams, e Berkshire Secretary of the National ssociation of Schoolmasters/Union of Women Teachers, linked the terms of the ppointment with what they regarded as e baleful effects of corporate manageent in Berkshire. Recently the district ffices have been closed to save money. hese had formerly been responsible for locating staff to schools. Other irritants ad arisen from the intervention of the roperty sub-committee of the policy ommittee. Without the education departent knowing anything about it, it was ddenly decreed that teachers using hool facilities for badminton, would ve to pay fees. This storm in a teacup ubsided: the teacher's badminton was estored, but such ludicrous failures of ommunication are seen as typical of corrate management. What is intended to chieve better coordination, too often ves no coordination at all.

While the teachers loosed off broadsides on a wide front, the Society of Education Officers mounted a sharp attack at the centre. A small delegation led by Mr Dudley Fiske, chief education officer of Manchester and this year's president of the society, waited on senior members of the county council and the Berkshire chief executive, Mr Robert Gash, on Tuesday afternoon.

The SEO was interested because the terms of appointment suggested that the authority might give the job to someone who was not even eligible to be a member of the society. The society's rules require that an education officer should satisfy two out of three conditions for membership. The three conditions are teaching experience; a period of general educational administration of not less than two years; a period of educational administration in the offices of a chief education officer for not less than four years. Thus a former teacher who became a head or college principal or chief inspector, would be eligible even if he or she hadn't been an education officer. (The present CEO for Norfolk is a former FE college principal.) But someone who came in from outside the education service without experience of teaching or any form of educational administration, would not. And the society also watches closely other conditions of appointment, including the chain of responsibility for educational policy advice.

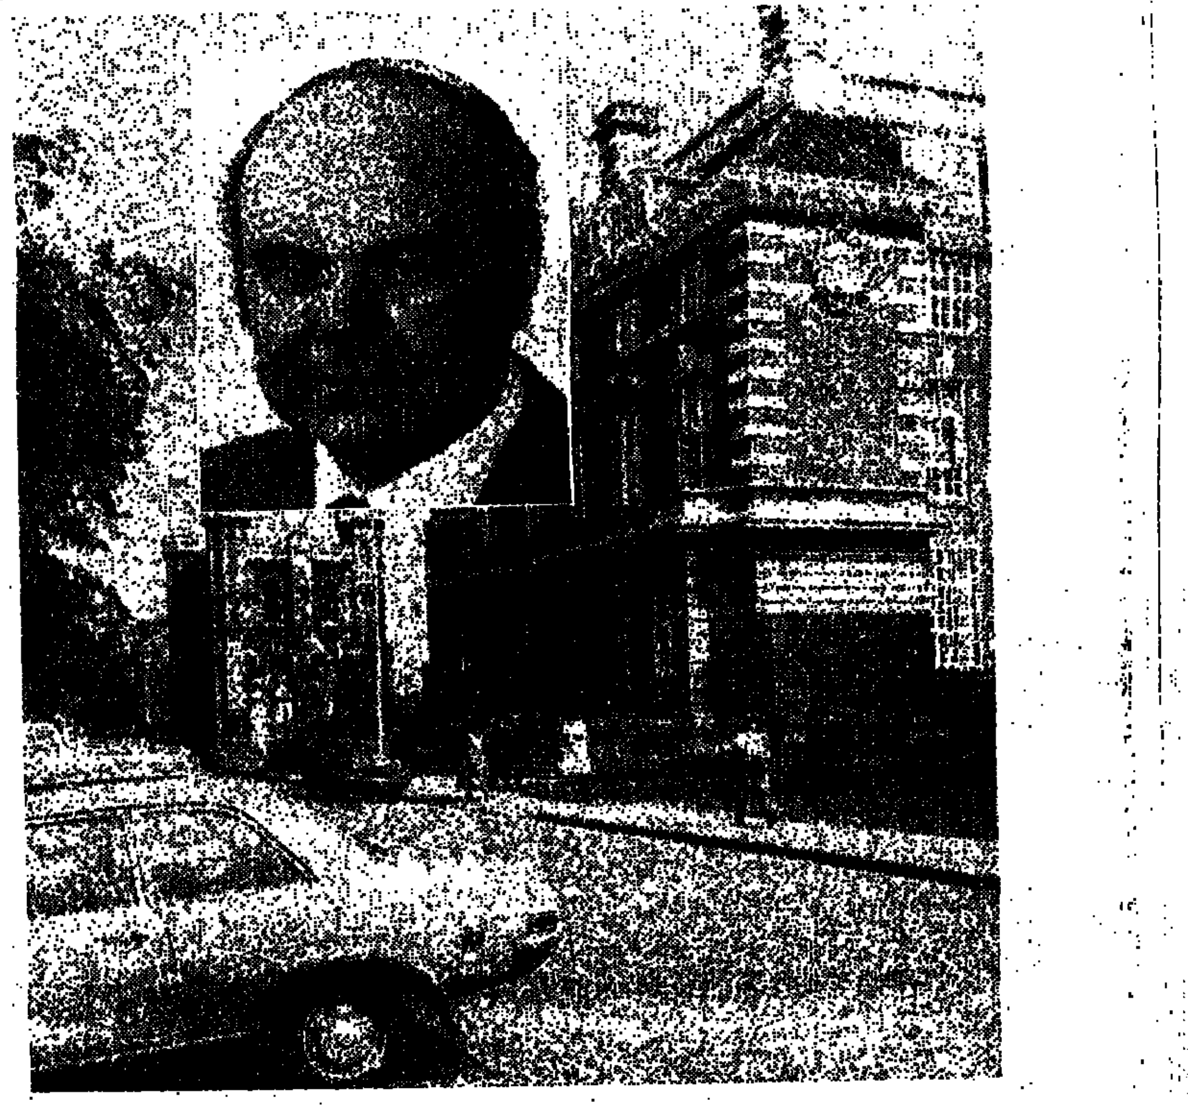
In the case of Berkshire, the society had to consider whether, in the light of the terms of the appointment, they should advise their members not to apply. They could "black" the job as, for a while, they blacked Avon and have put a bar on other appointments.

In the event, it seems that Berkshire have climbed down. An agreed statement was issued after the meeting with the SEO in the following terms: "The recent advertisement for a Director of Educational Services in Berkshire has given rise to misapprehensions at the authority's intentions. It is envisaged that the successful candidate will have wide knowledge and experience in education."

The earlier express denial of any requirement that the job would be confined to persons with a professional educational background has not been withdrawn. But the SEO are satisfied that Tuesday's press statement nullifies the offending sentence. "I regard it as a satisfactory meeting," said Mr Fiske. "I take it that the leaders of the Berkshire County Council whom we met are men of their word and I rely on the statement which they have made and the assurances they have given us privately."

It is most important from all points of view that this should be sorted out and that it should be accepted on all sides that the senior educational administrator employed by a local education authority should be fully-qualified professionally to act as the principal education policy adviser. No one would appoint a senior legal adviser who was not a lawyer. It should be clear by now what is required of a chief education officer. The particular combination of skills and experience is important. It is not to be replaced by "pure" managerial skills: it is certainly not practicable to talk about l.e.a.s playing a more active part in curriculum policy with less well-equipped leadership.

Behind the argument there remains the unrepentant desire of some devotees of corporate management to follow the original Bains advice and drop the statutory requirement to have a CEO. This was resisted when local government reorganization was eventually enacted, and it is up to Mrs Williams to make it plain that she is not prepared to see authorities do by the back door what Parliament refused to accept.



Riding out the storm at Shire Hall in Reading—Mr R. Gash, chief executive to Berkshire County Council.

L.e.a.s. split on extra duties

by Stephen Cohen

xteen local authorities have roken ranks from the Council of ocal Education Authorities and ssued assurances to the National ssociation of Schoolmasters-Union f Women Teachers that out-of-hool activities are purely voluntary.

The council, which acts as a forum r all 104 local education authories, has advised its members not o negotiate with the union over he dispute on voluntary activities. ut Mr Bernard Wakefield, NAS-WT assistant general secretary, aid this week that he had received atisfactory assurances from 16 uthorities.

The authorities involved are: edfordshire, Calderdale, Cheshire, lwyd, Dorset, Gwynedd, Hampshire, Havering, Hertfordshire, iverpool, Nottinghamshire, Oxfordhire, Sefton, Shropshire, West ussex and Wirral.

The union has instructed its members not to undertake any duties utside normal school hours—such as parent-teacher evenings or staff meetings after 4 pm.

Mr Wakefield said the ban would be successful although its full impact would not be felt for some time. But at no stage would it affect the education of children. "Every child is being taught properly. Examinations are being held and marked. There are not going to be any children out of school."

The union's ban on voluntary activities, which does not extend to lunch-time duties, was introduced after the Inland Revenue decided to tax the travel allowances teachers were paid when they returned to school in the evening or on Saturday morning for sports fixtures.

Tax inspectors asked CLEA if these duties were voluntary or contractual and, according to the NAS-UWT, were given a vaguely worded reply which implied that they were part of a teacher's contract—and thus paid duties—which could be taxed.

The union then set about obtaining assurances from individual authorities that the duties were, in fact, voluntary. Although the CLEA school teachers' committee discusses working conditions, it has, on its own admission, no authority to conclude national agreements which will be binding on the local authorities.

Mr Gordon Cunningham, a joint education officer of CLEA, said this week that the NAS-UWT claims about the number of authorities which had made agreements "resembles a house of cards".

With only a few exceptions, the authorities were united behind the CLEA line, he said. CLEA had invited the teacher unions to discuss the whole issue on May 22.

"In those areas where sanctions have begun, we hope the NAS-UWT will see the harm that their action

Swings and roundabouts

The local elections seem to have produced results which satisfied just about everyone except the Scottish Nationalists. The Labour Party did better than they had feared. The Conservatives had specific gains to their credit (though not enough to gain control of ILEA or Manchester) and even the Liberals could find crumbs of comfort here and there. The psephologists had prepared the ground in advance by emphasizing the difficulty of making comparisons.

The wards where elections were held this year included some which last voted in 1973 and others where the relevant comparison was with 1974. Moreover, extensive boundary changes complicated the issue and prevented any simple calculation of swings and roundabouts.

The Conservatives have emerged in control of five more local education authorities. In two more they are the strongest single party and are likely to find the necessary minority support to take over. In Liverpool, the Labour and Liberal parties predominate but who runs the city will depend on negotiations between the parties.

There is also an important change at the Association of Metropolitan Authorities where, when they have got themselves organized, the Conservatives will have a majority. The AMA has been in Labour hands since its formation in 1974 after local government reorganization and there has been a tacit assumption that it naturally "belonged" to Labour, as the Association of County Councils seems to belong naturally to the Conservatives. Now the usual local government swing against the party in power at Westminster will give the Tories control of both the major local authority associations and, hence, of the Council of Local Education Authorities. This means that in the continuous flow of consultation and negotiation between the local authorities and the Department of Education and Science, the Conservatives will be in a position to play a leading part. Many of these consultations are technical and do not give rise to obvious party differences. But in many other cases, as for example, with the Expenditure Steering Group (Education), the technical and political issues are bound to come together as preparations go forward for the next Rate Support Grant Settlement. It means also that the political balance among the employers' representatives on the Burnham Committee is likely to change. In view of what happened last time, and Sir Ashley Bramall's last ditch efforts to prevent a confrontation with the teachers, this could well be significant.

Through a glass darkly

Any optimists and pessimists who turned to Mr St John-Stevas's article in The Times this week—"How the Tories would reform secondary education"—to see what might be in store for them if there is a change of government, will have ended up in as great a fog as ever.

Until the Conservatives are confronted with the necessity of actually doing something, they are probably wise to refrain from revealing more clearly than they must the inconsistencies of their position. So they continue to insist that they are for comprehensives, for selection, for specialized provision for different types of children, for small schools (which make such provision more difficult) and for improved standards. All very vague.

Rather more profitable a line, in terms of how improvements might be achieved, was that suggested to the Conservatives by Dr Harry Judge in the last of their current series of education lectures at the House of Commons on Tuesday (page 3).

In arguing for more rigorous induction and probationary arrangements, more in-service training and a more practical initial training following consecutively on general higher education, Dr Judge has restated the doctrine of the James committee. By insisting that improvements must rely upon the best members of the teaching profession themselves taking responsibility both through a teachers' council and through the training programmes he points to the only practical way in which the job can be done. He also repeated his plea for changes in the heads' freehold.

On the other hand, the provision of the sort of working conditions which, he argues, are essential if teachers are not to exhaust themselves with running simply to stand still, will depend upon Government policy and, in particular, Treasury generosity.

Large increases in public spending on education do not seem likely to be forthcoming from the present Government. They must surely be even less likely from a Conservative Government which believes public expenditure should be cut not just as a matter of expediency, but as a matter of principle.

Home or away?

For all the persecution complex endemic in higher education about its share of public spending cuts, the DES is standing firm on what many regard as a basic academic freedom: the right of every potential student to have access to the national network, rather than be forced to accept whatever courses are on offer at the neighbourhood university.

This week the department publishes an interim report (page 5) of the "review" which the Public Accounts Committee asked for, as a matter of urgency, on the problem of encouraging more students to live at home. While the report acknowledges that this might, in the more favourable circumstances, save the taxpayer around £600 a year for each student, its whole tenor is that this would not be worth doing.

"The possibility of achieving a marginal increase in the number of students living at home" it concludes, must be "balanced against the bitter hostility of both staff and students to what might be construed as an attack on academic freedom."

In this it echoes the PAC recognition of the intangible benefits of university residence and maximum freedom of choice in course selection. These the committee listed as the social and intellectual life of the residential community, the problem of home circumstances unconducive to study and the need of young people for independence.

The first of these may be more idealistic than real, as witness the empty campuses at weekends, when the majority of students seem to hitch-hike home from their intellectual communities. For the rest it should perhaps be recognized that the main reasons students have for going away to college are social rather than educational.

The Kent University survey which the DES commissioned found that about half the students in their sample gave independence as their reason for not living at home, 20 per cent lack of available courses and 4 per cent difficult home conditions.

However, recognition of the social factors does not make them any less valid, nor does the intangibility of the educational benefit. This is what higher education is about, and in a country the size of Britain we should be better able to indulge it than most.

Maths under the microscop

Two per cent of children in England and Wales are about to take part in a major monitoring programme. COLIN SELBY explains

During May 1978 the first Monitoring Survey in Mathematics of the Assessment of Performance Unit is taking place. About 12,500 children are involved in a sample of roughly 2 per cent of the total number of pupils aged 11 in England and Wales. The children attend just over 1,000 schools, mostly junior and middle schools, and comprise about one-third of the pupils aged 11 in the schools concerned.

The schools have been asked to administer the tests on a convenient day and a further two weeks have been allowed for the testing of absentees as they return to school. Each child is being given one of a number of different pencil and paper tests. It is not possible to set one test paper of reasonable length which covers the total range of mathematics offered to children of this age.

The schools have been chosen so as to ensure a proper representation by region, location, school type and size. Within these categories selection is random. With the exception of special schools all schools are being involved, and in each school the required sample of children will be chosen according to the day on which their birthday falls.

The tests are not timed but most children should complete them in 45-50 minutes. They have been developed within the guidelines laid down by the Mathematics Steering Group of the APU set out in the discussion document Monitoring Mathematics which has been circulated to all l.e.a.s and the schools taking part in the first survey of 11-year-olds. Copies have also been sent to colleges and departments of education and to some other interested bodies.

These tests, and other means of assessment, have been developed by the team working at the National Foundation for Educational Research and commissioned by the APU. A typical test will include questions from three of the 13 sections of the primary mathematics item collections. For example, starting with computations using natural numbers and decimals a test might then continue with work on shapes, lines and angles and finish with questions involving money, time, weight or temperature.

Complete confidentiality will be maintained and there will be no identification of children, schools or l.e.a.s in any reports arising from the monitoring programme. The reports from the APU will provide more comprehensive information about mathematical performance in the schools than has previously been available. It must be emphasized that at this stage we cannot anticipate the form of the analysis of the test results but the monitoring is being designed to provide details of the national state of mathematical performance. As monitoring proceeds over the years trends will be looked for, and with larger aggregate samples, finer detail will be able to be described with more confidence.

While no long-term testing programme, even one adopting the light sampling approach used by the APU, can avoid some effect on the school curriculum, the monitoring programme is designed to keep this to a minimum. A framework describing the areas of mathematics which will be included in the tests (Monitoring Mathematics pages seven and eight) has been drawn up by the monitoring team in discussion with the Mathematics Steering Group and represents their best judgment of the range of mathematical activities going on in classrooms up and down the country, although it is unlikely that every school covers every part of the range. The item collections produced by the Monitoring Team are based on this framework and have drawn on the earlier work of the Tests of Attainment in Mathematics in Schools (TAMS) project at the NFER. The APU monitoring therefore aims to avoid any narrowing of this range of work, nor should there be any temptation to "teach to the test" since each child will receive a different sub-test covering a limited range of his studies in mathematics. The total range of sub-tests is unlikely to be taken in any individual school. The small sample of pupils being tested each year will mean that individual schools are involved in the monitoring relatively infrequently and this should further reduce the impact of the monitoring on the schools.

In addition to the pencil and paper tests there will be two other parts to the monitoring prog mathematics—practical te attitude questionnaire. D summer term 1,000 of the taking the pencil and p will also take a practical te tests will be conducted by recruited and trained for by the monitoring team. T will last for about 30 minute ren will be put at their ease possible and scoring will t account strategy, execution curacy. A sub-sample is bei because of the expenses of t of testing but the APU h concerned to include practic ing in an attempt to allow who may have reading dif to have a better chance to their mathematical abilities because practical work is a of mathematics in primary and the monitoring aims t this.

Straightening out Labour relations

Sir,—I have recently received a copy of an article in your supplement of April 21 which alleges that the Labour Party NEC Science and Education Sub-Committee has criticized Shirley Williams as Secretary of State.

May I as chairman of the Sub-Committee categorically state that the Sub-Committee has never criticized the Secretary of State's performance and that I have no knowledge whatsoever that "senior members" of the Labour Party have complained to the Prime Minister about her performance.

The Secretary of State has always been eager to meet members of my Sub-Committee and we have had some very useful discussions during which many common areas of agreement have been reached.

Your article states that "two major issues are said to have prompted the campaign against Mrs Williams". One of the major issues you cite is the closure of sixth forms in small and medium schools, yet since this issue has never been discussed by the Sub-Committee—which always has a very full agenda—how can this be the basis of any "complaint" against her? As regards the second issue of parental "choice" the Sub-Committee has had many meetings with Ministers and both they and members of the Sub-Committee have agreed that any policy on admissions to schools must not be based on parental "choice" but on many criteria including parental "preference".

It is, of course, true that the Sub-Committee and the NEC itself want the Government to adhere to manifesto and Labour's Progra by expanding provision for under-fives and the 16-19 age gr We in the Labour Party believe the only government capable expanding such provision is a L Government and we are at discussing with the Secretary State ways of expanding su visions.

I hope that your readers will know that the Sub-Committee relationship with Shirley Williams has always been a cordial and fruitful one and that the impressions reflected in your article were in curate.

One in 10 studies in front of the TV

One child in 10 in the 11 to 14 age group does his homework while watching television, while another 9 per cent fit it in between programmes. Eight per cent do not start homework until their viewing is finished but 45 per cent do it before they start watching television.

These figures come from a nationwide survey of 1,636 young people between seven and 17 drawn from the main social groups. It was commissioned by Pye, the television company.

Girls claim the greater facility at working and watching at the same time. They amount to 11 per cent compared with 9 per cent of boys.

But the difference widens dramatically among pupils over 15. Only [illegible] per cent of boys in this group try to watch television while they study, compared with 9 per cent of girls.

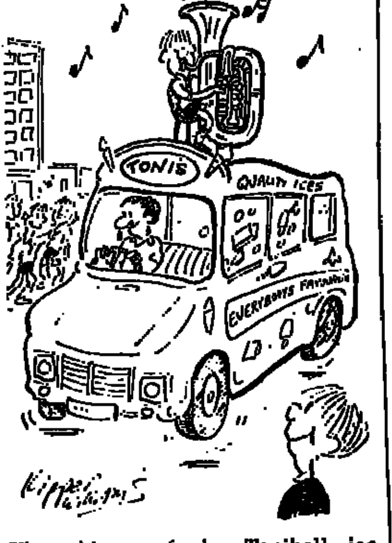
A sharp contrast was found between the habits of children in the AB socio-economic group, professional and managerial, and those from C2 homes, skilled and semi-skilled manual workers. Children of C2 workers were more than twice as likely to keep the set on while they worked. But it was children from the AB group who were most likely to wait until they had watched their favourite programmes before starting their homework.

Most time in front of the television was spent by those children who do their homework in between programmes. Just over one in four of these clocked up more than 28 hours a week, while only 10 per cent of the work-and-watch group reached this amount.

Those who get their homework finished before they turn to television are found in the South-West and Wales. The least conscientious are in the North and North-East where only one in four of all age-groups works first and relaxes later.

Three out of four children appear to have no limit set by their parents on how much television they watch, though most are given a time each night at which viewing must stop. This varies from 9 pm for those in the 7-14 age group, to 11 pm for 48 per cent of 15-17-year-olds.

Up to 43 per cent of children are allowed to watch what they want, but 12 per cent of the sample said their parents exercised a lot of control over programme selection.



The chimes of the Toniboll ice cream van are sweet music to the head of a Surrey comprehensive. While the pupils lick their cornets, the school orchestra benefits from a share in the profits.

Mr Bernard Roder, head of Ashcombe School, Dorking, has struck a bargain with an icecream salesman, who may now park his van on the school premises in return for 10 per cent of the profits.

Mr Roder said this week that just under £10 had been received from the first four days of the agreement.

Rejection of two all-in plans angers l.e.a.s

Plans for comprehensive education in Derbyshire and North Yorkshire have been turned down by Mrs Shirley Williams, Education Secretary. The decisions have angered both local authorities and North Yorkshire is attempting to persuade her to change her mind.

Mrs Williams said she rejected the scheme for Selby because it would not lead to parity between schools in the area. It was planned to end selection at 11 for entry to Selby Grammar School and to enlarge it to 750 pupils aged 11 to 18. Selby County School would also become comprehensive but only for 11 to 16s. A third school in the area, which is already comprehensive, would remain unchanged.

The county education officer, Dr E. E. Owens, said Mrs Williams found the scheme unacceptable because only one school would have a sixth form. But, he said, there were only 114 sixth formers in the area and this did not justify the opening of a sixth form college. Spreading them out among the secondary schools would lead to very small sixth forms, he said.

A special meeting of the education committee will be held next month to discuss the effects of Mrs Williams's rejection. Meanwhile, efforts will be made to make her change her mind.

In Derbyshire, a scheme for the Matlock area was turned down because it could not be implemented until 1982. Mrs Williams also said the plan did not make sufficient use of building resources. Derbyshire education committee chairman, Mrs Annette Noskwith, said she was "horrified" by the decision.

The county wanted to create one 11 to 18 school out of two existing schools—one grammar and one secondary modern—and shut down another secondary modern. Mrs Williams said the closure was not the best plan. She argues that if the school was adapted, then the 11-plus could end in Matlock sooner than September, 1982, the date proposed by the county council.

Under the scheme submitted to her, selection would be phased out as new school buildings became available on the merged site. The earliest date was said to be 1982.

Mrs Noskwith said: "I am horrified that the Minister has once again chosen to overrule a decision of the education committee which was taken without any member speaking or voting against the proposals.

"In particular, I am surprised that the Minister should say that withdrawing the John Turner School from secondary education is an unwise use of resources, as the buildings would be used for other school provision.

"I hope the Minister will realize that every time she rejects the scheme, the less likelihood there is of any scheme being implemented in the Matlock area before 1982."

Mrs Williams has asked the county council to submit fresh plans within three months.

The London borough of Redbridge is to discuss proposals to abolish its two grammar schools—in eight years' time. The Conservative-controlled authority is one of the two London boroughs required by Mrs Williams to produce comprehensive plans by June 1.

Mr John Telford, chairman of the borough's education committee, said he was not seeking a confrontation with the Government, but it was impossible to produce proposals in the three weeks given by Mrs Williams.

The education committee agreed last week that Mr Telford should meet the chief education officer to discuss the possibilities of long-term changes to the two grammar schools and then report back.

Mr Telford said this week that the committee was "fortified" by the results of local elections and felt that it would instruct him to consider with the chief officer the development of proposals for the future role of the two academic centres.

"Any such proposals would start not earlier than 1984 and probably 1986", he said.

Mr J. E. Fordham, the chief officer, is to ask Mrs Williams for at least a three-month extension.

Teachers' image dented by 'sloppy theories'

The problem of incompetent and inadequate teachers could only be dealt with by establishing a general teachers' council, Dr Harry Judge, director of Oxford University department of education, told a Conservative Party education meeting at the House of Commons on Tuesday.

An end to the unlimited tenure of heads was now due and that also would be a matter for the council, which would be responsible for admission to and exclusion from the profession and for professional standards, Dr Judge said.

"Great damage was done to the image and effectiveness of teachers in the 1960s by the growth of loose and sloppy theories about education and teaching", he continued. The antidotes lay in locating teacher training firmly in schools, in the promotion of research into teacher effectiveness and in a livening up of teacher trainers.

"They should be drawn from the most successful practitioners in schools and not isolated in their own careers from work in schools", Dr Judge said.

Behind the challenges to teacher autonomy that came from the Taylor report and the reform of the Schools Council lay a growing uneasiness about what schooling was for. The role of the teacher was being redefined and it was certain to be less significant in the future compared with that of other partners in the educational enterprise.

"It is most important that positive steps are taken to ensure that teachers are helped to preserve their competence and their energy. Alarmingly little of their energy is devoted to improving their professional competence. They will need to be given lighter teaching loads and conditions of work more appropriate to the members of what should be a civilized and civilizing profession".

can do to the teaching profession as a whole as well as the strain which it places on relationships within schools and with parents", Mr Cunningham said.

As the NAS-UWT sanctions began on Monday, the National Association of Head Teachers appealed to the union to settle its grievances through negotiation.

Leaders of the 21,000-strong association said they were gravely concerned that heads would find it increasingly difficult to run their schools properly if, every time there was a dispute, teachers opted out of responsibilities which had always been regarded as professional obligations.

The sanctions, said the head, could only have harmful effects on pupils and were unnecessary.

In a statement on Monday, the association said: "The area of disagreement identified by the NAS-UWT, namely what is or is not voluntary service by teachers, should first be discussed in the readily available forum of the Council of Local Education Authorities—School Teachers negotiating body."

The next meeting of that organization is May 22 and the heads' association hoped that a working party would be set up or the dispute referred to the Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service.

"Consultation between teacher and teacher or between teacher and parent is vital to the effective work of the schools and this will be denied by the sanctions", the statement said.

For smokers

Holidays, watches, sports equipment, clothing and a year's supply of tea are being offered as prizes for smokers who give up cigarettes. The Royal Association for Disability and Rehabilitation (RADAR) is organizing an anti-smoking campaign starting next month.

Local education authorities are being sent details of the campaign and will be asked to circulate posters and leaflets to schools.

Scepticism as APU maths tests get under way

by Bob Doe

The first testing by the Government's Assessment of Performance Unit got under way this week amid a certain amount of scepticism about both methods and likely results.

Maths tests are being taken by more than 12,000 11-year-olds in 1,000 primary schools this month. A similar number of 15-year-olds will have their maths tested in November and English language tests for both age groups will start next year. Science is due to be assessed for the first time in 1979.

The unit is part of the Department of Education and is run by HMIs. They set out their proposals for maths testing three months ago in a discussion document called Monitoring Mathematics.

There has been little private or public reaction to this so far but the unit expects to get more comments after the tests have been taken.

In fact, the APU are relying on such feedback to ensure that the tests accurately reflect classroom practice. The unit, which has been under considerable political pressure to begin the testing programme, still has lessons to learn as it goes along about testing and sampling methods as well as just what to do with the results.

But teachers will have little scope for commenting on the tests at this stage. Only five per cent of primary schools and 10 per cent of secondaries will be involved and even these teachers will only see a portion of the overall maths test.

Using the method known as "light sampling" the unit expects to cover virtually the whole maths curriculum thoroughly, by combining the scores of many children on different parts of it, to give a national picture.

The statistical method the APU plan to use with "light sampling" is known as the Rasch model. It is also the basis on which the APU expects to be able to compare results from year to year—even when the test questions have to be updated—and to test across a wide range of abilities. It relies on calibrating the relative difficulty of each test question or "item" so making them comparable statistically.

But this procedure has been attacked by Professor Harvey Goldstein of the University of London Department of Statistics and Computing and Mr Steve Blinkhorn of the Department of Psychology, Hatfield Polytechnic (TES September 23, 1977).

They argue that this method only works if the questions are as difficult for all children, which does not necessarily apply. The questions that children find the hardest may vary.

The unit is said to be taking these criticisms seriously and has called a conference of their test and statistical experts following the Goldstein and Blinkhorn articles. It is still early days and this new method still has to be thoroughly investigated.

Two bodies have publicly welcomed the APU maths testing. The Association of Polytechnic Teachers said this week it believed "the task of the teachers can only be facilitated by the APU's efforts". It "looked forward to an improvement in basic mathematical ability consequent upon the efforts of the APU in the field of mathematics".

The Association of Teachers of Mathematics, in evidence to the select committee, which looked into school leavers' results said: "The work of the APU is the first realistic attempt to assess the whole range of mathematical understanding and may also reveal the extent to which changes in mathematics teaching have been successful."

The ATM said the debate about standards was a "red herring". The important questions were whether the attainments of school-leavers matched their needs and how to improve the quality of maths education.

Clearly, the APU recognizes the limitations of what it is doing at this stage. One HMI from the unit said this week they would show what standards were and it would be up to the public to say whether they were adequate. "There is a mistaken idea that you somehow improve things by testing. It is what you do with the information from this testing that matters", he said.

As local authorities and schools will not be identified in the APU's results, what emerges will be a national or regional picture of maths standards. The APU then expects local authorities and schools to do their own monitoring to see how they compare.

Mr John Hersee, director of the School Maths Project and chairman of both the Maths Association Teaching Committee and the Schools Council Maths Panel, said the APU tests would be useful if they established a base line from which to judge standards of numeracy. But the difficulty of accurately testing even relatively simple skills should not be underestimated.

The tests should include all the important aspects of a maths education. Though it looked as though the APU tests might be better than any previous ones, no one had yet seen them outside the APU.

The unit's attempts to monitor science, too, have come in for some criticism (TES, March 17). There was more this week from the Association for Science Education, the science teachers body.

Its education (research) committee said there was no value monitoring from year to year unless some attempt was made also to identify the reasons for any changes. The committee also complains that teachers will not get back from the APU any information to help them improve their teaching.

Tory gains leave Labour unruffled

by Lucy Hodges

Apart from the Conservative loss of Mr Donald Thorpe, who fought the famous battle about Tameside going comprehensive (see Aristides, page 96), last week's local election results brought few surprises.

As expected the Association of Metropolitan Authorities and the London Boroughs Association went Conservative thus depriving Labour of any representation in local authority discussions with the Government. But Labour held on comfortably to the Inner London Education Authority and did not lose as many Outer London boroughs as expected.

Altogether the Tories gained control of five education authorities—Ealing, Havering and Hillingdon, in London, Sandwell, in the West Midlands, and Oldham, in Greater Manchester. Labour also lost overall control of South Tyneside and Wolverhampton, which will probably end up being Conservative with the help of the Liberals and Ratepayers.

Liverpool remains in a state of chaos. Labour is the strongest party but has no majority and both Liberals and Tories are well represented.

In spite of the Conservatives' gains, Labour was not displeased with the results, especially in areas like Haringey where it was 42 seats against the Conservatives' 17. This was thought to be a marginal borough, but the Labour win was even better than in 1971, a landslide year locally.

Labour was also happy to keep Brent—which was tipped to go Tory—and Manchester and Newcastle, two shakey authorities. The National Front won nothing.

Negotiations are going on at the Association of Metropolitan Authorities to work out who is going to be on what committee and to determine how to change the built-in Labour majority on the policy committee.

There are now 42 Conservative to 35 Labour members of the association and this is likely to become 45 to 32 when the representation of Liverpool, Wolverhampton and Hammersmith is finally settled.

In Hammersmith, which is part of the ILEA, the balance of power is held by two Liberals.

Labour has a majority on the policy committee because of the association rule that chairmen of committees become ex-officio members of it. And since the present chairmen were chosen before the elections they are all Labour. It is expected to take weeks, if not months, for the parties to make sure that democracy triumphs.

Chairmanship of the education committee, now filled by Mrs Nikki Harrison, who also chairs Haringey's education committee, is likely to be taken over by Mr Malcolm Thornton, of the Wirral. He would like the committee to discuss the major education issues such as a core curriculum and the shortage of maths teachers.

The boroughs which went to the Conservatives have yet to sort out new committee chairmen. In Oldham, the chairman of the education committee is likely to be Mrs E. M. M. Boon, the present Conservative spokesman on education. The Tories' major plans, she says, will be to give all schools a sixth form and to operate an assisted places scheme.

School to work

Heads demand new deal for apprentices

A call for a new full-time education and apprenticeship scheme for 16-18-year-olds was made this week by the National Association of Head Teachers.

Under the scheme youngsters, whether at school, college or on a training course, would be paid from public sources an allowance to cover food, clothing, housing and other amenities.

Funds, controlled by one agency, could be raised from prospective employers, including the public service and nationalized industries. The scheme is outlined in a discussion document which will form part of a one-day conference on 16-19-year-olds to be opened in London today by Mrs Shirley Williams, the Education Secretary.

The 21,000-strong union says that while credit must be given to Government moves to ease the plight of this age group it does not like the way different agencies are setting up schemes without apparent coordination and is unhappy at the various forms of financial incentive being offered to youngsters at 16.

Those who stay at school or college get nothing; some can get £9 a week as unemployed, and others taking a Government training course can get £18 a week.

On another big educational controversy, the union says the removal of school-based sixth forms should not be undertaken on the basis of claims for alternatives which as yet are not fully proven.

The heads will also be discussing in private session the pros and cons of affiliating to the TUC and are likely to accept a National Council compromise motion which says affiliation would be premature.

TUC calls in two educationists

The TUC is to strengthen its tiny and increasingly overworked education department. The decision was made this week by the general secretary, Mr Len Murray.

Miss Kay Carberry, a graduate teacher in the education department of the National Union of Teachers, and Mr Peter Ashby, deputy president of the National Union of Students, are to become assistants to Mr Roy Jackson, the TUC's education secretary.

Essex YOP takeover could set careers officers on warpath

by Mark Jackson

The Manpower Services Commission has agreed to hand Essex education department the main responsibility for running the Youth Opportunities Programme, the Government scheme for school leavers, in the worst hit parts of the county. The commission is to pay the authority what is in effect a specific grant and leave it to provide the service.

Each young person joining the programme in the towns with heavy unemployment — Basildon, Colchester, Harlow and Thurrock—will start with a residential spell at one of the four local centres being set up by the department. The centre's staff will assess their needs and decide whether they should stay on at the training workshops which will be run at the centres, or either join a community service project or go to employers for work experience. The department will coordinate the projects run by voluntary and public bodies, and pay their sponsors out of the commission grant.

The commission's East Anglia area board has already approved a seven hundred and fifty thousand pounds a year budget for the initial stage of the scheme, whose cost is likely to rise to £1m when it is in full operation.

Although the commission's staff and the careers service will remain directly responsible for finding work experience places, the youngsters concerned will return to the centres for one day a week to learn life and social skills and for counselling, and the centres will maintain contact with those who go to skills training courses in colleges. The education department, says its director, Mr J. A. Springett, is determined that the learning needs of each youngster should be met as effectively as possible. "That is the whole idea of integration, and it is difficult to see who can do it if the education authority doesn't", he says.

The Essex arrangement will encourage those who have been saying that the Youth Opportunities Programme is "up for grabs" an any local authority prepared boldly enough can ensure dominates the scheme in its It is also likely to be welcom those in education and the organizations who are convinced somebody must take responsi for integrating the arrangemen each area if the programme live up to its promises

The way in which Essex is al ing that responsibility is hav already threatening to bring surface a deep conflict of sec interests within the education vice nationally. While a numbe other authorities, mainly in cities like Coventry, have introd fairly comprehensive integ schemes, they have left the task of assessing participants to careers officers. Essex is han this role to the staff running centres, who are mainly drawn its community youth education so that while the careers will still be nominally res sible for finding the young pe for the scheme, it will only be share in deciding what happen them.

The county's careers chief Alan Lewis, is thought to rather than support the arra ment. But his colleagues in the I tute of Careers Officers are ma plain their hostility to the way E is running the scheme, and pla fight any attempt to adopt it a national model.

Their resentment at the la scheme is compounded by the that it has been given to Mr Hopwood, the county's former chief, to run. Mr Hopwood has been made a senior educ officer with responsibility for careers department as well as munity education: but the have noted that he is drawing his old department to admin the scheme and has chosen munity education staff to run of the new centres, the fourth which will be headed by a car officer.

Workers to take look at schools

A reversal of the usual link-up between school and industry has been organized by the London Borough of Ealing. Instead of explaining industry to schools it aims to show factory workers how the education system works.

The borough's community education team has been running a series of exhibitions in the works canteen of a local breakfast food factory dealing with each stage of the system from pre-school educ upwards. Members of the have found themselves be with requests for information advice on everything from safety to the core curriculum pastoral arrangements in school and say that, although more tha half the factory's workforce from ethnic minorities, all social and ethnic groups w equally concerned to find out about how the education syst works.

PERSONAL COLUMN

John Rae

Curriculum conundrum

I have been much attacked for suggesting that at this point in our history we should be prepared to accept a greater degree of central direction of the curriculum. The almost universal nature of the rejection of this idea and the intensity with which that rejection has sometimes been expressed has made me reexamine my approach. I remain convinced, however, that we shall not get the secondary curriculum we need in this country unless we accept a measure of direction from the centre. I am puzzled by my isolation on this issue and by the hostility my stance provokes.

I would like to run over the arguments for my approach with particular reference to Section I, "The case for a common curriculum in secondary education to 16", in the Inspectorate's working paper Curriculum 11-16.

I found much to admire and give assent to in the inspectors' analysis and conclusions. But in Section I there is what almost amounts to a piece of doublespeak on this question of central direction. I do not think for a moment it is intentionally evasive or ambiguous. I believe that the inspectors, like so many others pondering this problem, want to move towards some form of common curriculum but hope that this can be achieved by agreement. This is not a dishonest approach but I think it is an unrealistic one.

The inspectors make out an entirely convincing case for a compulsory element in the 11-16 curriculum, occupying between two-thirds and four-fifths of the timetable. This compulsory curriculum is based on the concept of essential "areas of experience"— mathematical, linguistic, spiritual, aesthetic and so on—that pupils have a right to encounter in their schooldays. So far so good. But how do the inspectors see such a compulsory curriculum becoming anything more than a theoretical concept? I searched the document in vain for an answer. At the brink of that dark river the inspectors drew back.

Fair enough: they may well argue that this step was not part of their brief. But they are explicit about how the step will not be taken. They say in the general introduction: "There is no intention anywhere in the papers which follow of advocating a centrally controlled or directed curriculum." That is a clear and unequivocal statement. But it is swiftly followed by such modifications as, "What has, so often been implicit may well have to be explicit", and "strongly held assumptions are bound to be questioned, not least those concerning degrees of autonomy to be enjoyed by the school, the head, the head of department and the teacher in the classroom".

Am I alone in thinking that if this autonomy is to be reduced, then someone, somewhere, however tentatively, however skilfully disguised as partnership or agreement, will be exercising a little more direction or control than is the case at present?

You see my point. For 18 months we have been debating education and the content of that debate has increasingly been concerned with the curriculum. If that debate, sometimes frustrating but more often fruitful and constructive, is not now to fade away till nothing is left except memory, we must face this question: if there is agreement on the need for a compulsory element in the curriculum in the 11-16 years, how will that curriculum be achieved if it is not by some central, perhaps statutory, direction to schools?

The answer implicit in the inspectors' paper is this. There will be discussion among all interested parties leading to agreement on what the compulsory element should be. It will then be for heads, examination boards, universities and employers to reflect that agreement in such a way that the compulsory element becomes the norm. It will be pointed out that the compulsory curriculum proposed by the inspectors is already in use in many schools and that it is only a question of encouraging the others to come into line. Heads are not irresponsible people: when they see what is the clear wish of society they will respond to it. This is the British way of allowing drainage to evolve rather than imposing it by direction and experience suggests that this is the best approach in the British context.

That is almost convincing but not quite. I do not believe that without the force of law behind it, a common compulsory curriculum would ever become universal; and if it is not universal it ceases to be valuable either to the child or to society.

Why is the concept of direction so vehemently opposed? It is nonsense to talk about the dangers of totalitarianism. We are a free people. If we fear that some central direction of the school curriculum is a step towards totalitarianism, we have no faith in the resilience of democracy. I cannot see what possible objection there could be in a democracy to parliament issuing the following directive: all secondary schools will ensure that all pupils study up to the age of 16 a common curriculum for not less than two-thirds and not more than four-fifths of their timetable; that curriculum to be defined by parliament on advice of the Schools Council and the Inspectorate and after discus sion with interested parties. Wh fundamental freedom is being fringed? Is it an essential liber of this country that a head tea should have the right to deny pupils the opportunity to study one of the vital "areas of exper ence"?

It is time we discussed open exactly what the objections are a greater degree of governme direction in the curriculum. Th issue does not only affect the to 16 age group. If N and F pro became reality the question wo arise of whom will police the ch of Ns and Fs to prevent pupi choosing a narrower, not a broad sixth form curriculum. Leave it the schools, says the Joint Exami tions Sub-Committee in Working Paper 60. But, as SCUE points in its paper Universities and th N and F Proposals, there will be pressures against schools and pupi to make the broader choice order to get the broader curricul firmly established", says SCUE "the inclinations of sixth-form would probably need to be rein forced in some way."

Is it not time we recognized that there are going to be particular points in the development and modernization of our curriculum where the traditional autonomy of heads will have to be restrained by a framework of rules laid down by the central government representing the wishes of society?

survey was undertaken by ES in response to a request in port of the Public Accounts mittee and was considered by ommittee when it heard DES nce last month.

It found that only 10 per cent of university students in England and Wales lived at home compared with 28 per cent of students in polytechnics and colleges of education. In Scotland, however, 42 per cent of university students live at home.

Little is being done in universities to encourage students to live at home. When the University Grants Committee asked universities what efforts were being made "the responses were almost entirely negative. Only Nottingham and Southampton positively encouraged applications from home-based students while Cambridge expressed strong opposition to the introduction of any such consideration into the selection procedure".

The cost of paying "away rate" awards to home-based students could have been £25m in 1977-78, says the report. But there was no reliable way of estimating how students would respond to that incentive.

To reverse the approach and pay the lower "at home" grant to all except those who had to go away to study a particular course would put universities near centre of population at a disadvantage by restricting choice of candidates. It would also tend to standardize courses, and it was not certain that students sent unwillingly to their local institution would, in fact, live at home.

Imposing quotas would mean that admission was governed not by academic quality or suitability but by home address and could lead to the creation of differing standards of entry into higher education.

Referring to a survey into student lodging commissioned from the University of Kent in 1973, the DES says it disagrees with its conclusion reported last year, that student accommodation was not fundamentally an educational issue at all but simply a problem of housing.

This is described as "an over-simplification and contrary to the Government view that student residence is the joint responsibility of the DES and the Department of the Environment".

Nursery teachers told: 'Extend your role'

by Bob Doe

Nursery teachers need to take a wider view of their role and work out the outlines of a curriculum for three- to five-year-olds, Mr Norman Thomas, HM chief inspector of primary education, told the annual meeting of the British Association for Early Childhood Education in Bolton this week.

They would have to become the managers and tutors of the other adults who had a part to play in the education of the under-fives.

Nursery nurses were the teachers' most precious resource, and it was up to them to make the fullest use of it. But increasingly parents, often with experience of playgroups behind them, also wanted to help. The nursery teacher would have to find the best way of letting them do so. This applied even more to the boys and girls from secondary schools who visited nursery classes as part of child development courses.

Nursery teachers, he said, could also use their expertise to support local playgroups or childminders. Some, like teacher-social or community workers, visited homes to reach parents who would not otherwise take their children to nursery schools.

All this involved "a very special kind of tutorship in which there ought to be a sharing of expertise and knowledge. I have no doubt that these extensions of the nursery teacher's role can do nothing but increase her status".

The services for the under-fives should work closely and harmoniously together, but there were times when rivalry displaced cooperation.

However, nursery teachers should think more about their own special contribution to bringing up three- to five-year-olds. They should decide what children needed to learn, based on what the children knew when they came to them and what would follow later.

"They need to know where the work of the nursery staff fits into the whole process of education. This requirement has not diminished the obligation to treat children according to their current needs."

What children do in nursery classes should depend on what they are to learn and not the other way round. Language development, early scientific and mathematical ideas, physical coordination, and the development of social relationships and aesthetic responses amounted to the broadest outlines of a curriculum needed for three- to five-year-olds.

● Labour women are hoping to persuade the Prime Minister to back their campaign to compel local authorities to provide nursery education. The issue will be debated at the National Conference of Labour Women which opens in Southport on Sunday.

Mrs Mary Cohen, the conference chairman said this week that she hoped Government backing for the statutory provision of nursery education would come out of the conference.

Union to discuss the 14-19s

A major national conference on the education of the 14-19 age group will be held in London on June 8 and 9. It is being organized by the National Union of Teachers.

Speakers will include Mrs Shirley Williams, the Education Secretary, Mr K. Helweg Petersen, former Danish Minister of Education and Culture, Mr Richard O'Brien, chairman of the Manpower Services Commission, and Professor Gerry Fowler, MP, chairman of Youthaid. The guest speaker at the conference dinner will be Mr John Tomlinson, chairman of the Schools Council and chief education officer of Cheshire.

Council in row over uniforms

Birmingham teachers and social workers have threatened to take the city council to the Ombudsman unless it changes its policy on grants for school uniforms.

Poor families in the city who cannot afford to pay for uniforms have been at the centre of a row since last autumn, when the council cut the £350,000 allocated for uniform grants from its budget. It has since set up a £30,000 "hardship fund", which is described as "completely inadequate" by the school uniform campaign group.

The council has also told secondary heads that parents on supplementary benefit should approach the Department of Health and Social Security for help, despite warnings from the Supplementary Benefits Commission that it cannot provide money for uniforms or sports kit.

"The council is passing the buck by cutting back on its educational budget then putting the responsibility on the department", said Louise Webb, a campaign worker.

The group has complained that besides being inadequate the hardship fund money is handed out on a haphazard basis. And vouchers are sent not to parents, but to education welfare officers, who then have to accompany the parents to the shops. "It is degrading and badly organized", said Miss Webb.

The ladies' match, won by Thames with 72 points, followed by Birmingham (56) and Ulster (50) was far more open. Eddy (Birmingham) set up a new record in the 200 metres and 400 metres, beating Kennedy (Trent) in the 200 metres and knocking almost a second off the Nottingham girl's record in the process. In the 400 metres Eddy bettered her own 1977 record, again by almost a second.

Other ladies' records fell in the long jump (Phillips, Ulster), javelin (O'Toole, Thames), and 1,500 metres (Blake, Plymouth).

Many American parents prefer their children to have a church education. David Walker reports on an important conference

Catholic schools ready for academic and financial boom

Church schools in America are poised to enjoy a new era of growth and prosperity after a precipitous decline in recent years. At least, that was the majority opinion of Catholic teachers and parish leaders at the annual conference of the National Catholic Education Association in St Louis.

The rate at which Catholic schools have been closing has been cut. In the current education climate, the Catholic schools' emphasis on discipline and academic achievement gives them an edge when schools are rated according to pupil performance in objective tests.

They do it at less cost, too. A recent survey estimated the cost per pupil in New York City parochial schools was less than a quarter of that in the local authority system.

The St Louis conference heard Catholic schools praised by the black community leader, Rev Jesse Jackson. "If public schools continue to fail to help blacks, blacks must support those schools which challenge public education", he said. Catholic schools had done good work in educating the black youth of the inner cities.

The optimism of Catholic educators was boosted recently by the warm reception given in Congress to proposals to give tax relief to the parents of children in private schools. The best known of such proposals, one by senators Daniel Moynihan and Bob Packwood, would, by providing up to $500 tax relief, take care of the financial problems of Catholic schools for many years.

Altogether about 4.8 million or 1 in 10 of American children are enrolled in private schools. Of these nearly 3.3 million are in Catholic elementary and secondary schools, mainly in New York, New Jersey, Illinois, Ohio and New England.

Some of these schools do heroic work in deprived areas. A good example is St Brigid's, an elementary school in Manhattan. The headmistress, a nun, takes in children from a poor area—97 per cent of the pupils come from ethnic minorities and 99 per cent are "deprived" according to conventional measures.

Despite that, the 1976 objective test scores showed the school, on average, to be no more than two months below national norms—no small success in a city where many schools are two or three years behind.

These schools are a success from the point of view of the Roman Catholic church, too. Surveys have shown that the former pupils of Catholic schools make better parishioners and contribute more money to parish funds than Catholics who went to state schools. Many non-Catholics attend private Catholic schools, too, and among these a significant number of blacks.

Despite these positive aspects of Catholic education, its decline since the mid-1960s has been dramatic. Since 1966 over 3,500 schools have shut and the total number of pupils attending church schools fallen by 2 million. This happened at a time when other types of private education expanded.

Demography is working against the Catholic schools, too. A study by population experts showed the fertility of Catholic women to be dropping rapidly to the level of the population at large. There are 14.2m school-aged children in Catholic families this year of whom 3.3m attend Catholic schools. By the mid-1980s the catchment will have fallen to 12.6m.

For all the optimism at St Louis Catholic education faces a number of long-term problems, some of which are rooted in the way the schools run—for instance, the role of lay teachers. In recent years more and more of the staff of Catholic schools have been professional teachers rather than nuns or members of the teaching orders such as Jesuits.

There is bound to be friction between these lay teachers and the religious who, by and large, remain in control of the schools through headships and senior administrative appointments. Already the professional teachers are moving towards collective bargaining, often through the unions; the church is against this.

Some teachers favour both growth of non-Catholic numbers within the Catholic schools and cooperation with local state-run schools. Within the church, however, there is a strand of opinion that views state education as the home of godlessness.

In addition there is a continuing debate in Catholic educational circles about whether a strategic error was made in the 1960s when relatively few new schools were built in suburban areas—areas to which Catholics were then moving.

Catholic schools are concentrated in inner city areas with a strong role in Hispanic and minority Communities but, according to some Catholic writers, confused between their missionary and parish priest roles.

Finance is another big issue. Should parishes continue to underwrite the relatively low fees or should the burden be shifted to parents? A pressing problem is paying for the pensions of many nuns who have devoted their careers to teaching. In many areas no effective provision was made to build up trust funds for their retirement.

Australia

Senate debate on quali of children's television

from John Kirkaldy

SYDNEY

Australia has the best selection of children's television programmes in the world. This surprising and generally unnoticed fact was claimed by Mr Kerry Packer before a Federal Senate Committee on Education and Arts in Sydney.

Mr Packer, taking a break from his cricket circus, said: "I think we have the best television in the world. I say that under oath and I'm aware that I'm saying that under oath."

Mr Packer, who has extensive newspaper and television holdings, claimed that his group, Publishing and Broadcasting Ltd, was doing "more in children's programming than any other network in the world".

He said his network broadcast more than 1,000 hours of shows for children a year, more than any other Australian or foreign network. Ten per cent of his Channel Nine's programming costs were allocated to children's shows.

Not all educationists and broadcasters share Mr Packer's views. Earlier the Senate committee heard Mr Bruce Gyngell, chairman of the Australian Broadcasting Tribunal, describe Mr Packer as "the biggest miscreant in the whole business" of television programming.

Parents and teachers are concerned at the range and quality of children's television in Australia. Many of the programmes are imported, mainly from Britain and America. Only one channel (the Australian Broadcasting Corporation) out of Sydney's four is non-commercial and concern has been expressed at children being constantly exposed to advertising.

Mr Packer rejected proposals made to the inquiry that television advertising should be banned between 4 pm and 6 pm. He said research showed that 46 per cent of homes had no children at home watching television at that time and that twice as many children watched television at 8 pm.

He believed that after 8 pm parents had the responsibility of controlling the shows their children watched. "We really don't feel it's our responsibility to tell parents how to bring children up", he said. Research commissioned by his company showed that 80 per cent of parents were happy with the television shows that their children watched.

Mr Gyngell suggested that a "promise of performance" regarding television quality could be exacted from television stations when they applied to renew their licences.

Kerry Packer: 'Best TV'.

Mr Packer claimed that television controlled by Gov is the worst television you se said that most critics of it were "book-oriented people resent the effect that it has".

"I think it's rather fright that the Government should what type of programme will at what time. I don't think you the expertise to do so", he s

Republic of Ireland

Unions consulted over alternative to the cane

from John Walshe

DUBLIN

Irish Education Minister, Mr John Wilson, is having discussions with teaching unions and school managerial organizations about the use of corporal punishment in schools, and is seeking their views on alternative methods of discipline.

The discussions follow a debate in the Dail, the Irish parliament, initiated by Labour Party education spokesman, Mr John Horgan.

The continued and officially tolerated use of corporal punishment in the primary schools is a subject of great controversy. The regulations state that it should be administered only in the case of serious misbehaviour.

They stipulate that it should be administered by the principal or other members of the school staff authorized by the school management.

There is provision for action against teachers who inflict "improper or excessive punishment". They will be subject to severe disciplinary action by the Ministry.

Although no reliable surveys have been carried out it is generally agreed that there is far less corporal punishment in primary schools than there used to be.

Managerial organizations say that the phasing out of physical punishment reflects the developing attitudes of communities in general towards the treatment of children in the context of their educational progress, and the increasing cooperation between parents and teachers.

But the fact that it is still officially tolerated and used in some schools angers various anti-corporal punishment organizations. Arguments about over-large classes causing discipline problems cut little ice with organizations like REFORM, a militantly anti-corporal punishment organization.

An attempt was made during the life of the previous government to outlaw corporal punishment. Fifteen MPs signed a private members motion demanding its complete abolition, but it never reached the floor of parliament. A similar motion has been tabled for the present Government.

At the post primary level, there are no specific controls for the private secondary schools which cater for two-thirds of the school-going population in this age group. The union, which represents the teachers working in the private secondary schools, recently voted narrowly to outlaw the use of physical punishment, but its decision has no legal weight.

Recently, the Secretariat of Secondary Schools issued guidelines to school managers on discipline. No mention was made of corporal punishment in the guidelines which outlined procedures for temporarily suspending and ultimately expelling difficult pupils.

Youth employment plan 'failing'

from Dalbert Hallenstein

BRESCIA

Labour and union experts have met Minister of Labour, Vincenzo Scotti, to work out changes to last year's emergency youth employment scheme which has so far proved an almost complete failure.

Of 660,000 jobless young people who registered for work under the scheme last summer, only a few thousand have been found jobs. 1,200,000 young people are currently unemployed or underemployed in Italy—and this is contributing to the explosive political and social situation.

The youth employment programme offers financial and tax incentives to employers willing to take on unemployed young people on contracts not exceeding two years.

State and local government authorities have also been financed to employ young people in a wide variety of schemes ranging from guardianship of understaffed museums, libraries and archaeological sites to the reorganization of the chaotic public records and tax offices.

But so far prospective employers have refused to collaborate with the project and both state and local governments, paralysed by bureaucracy, have taken on an insignificant number of unemployed young people—despite the cash being available.

Sweden

Teachers under more stress than other professionals

from Colin Narbrough

MALMOE

Teachers are under more stress than any other professional group of state employees in Sweden, according to the latest research in job satisfaction and work-related health problems.

Almost half of all public sector workers wanting to transfer to a field of work other than that they originally qualified for are teachers. A lot of cases involved considerable personal distress.

Statistics compiled by the State Staff Commission show that school stress affects women and men teachers equally. The largest group of transfers are for the age group 35 to 40, affecting teaching staff with an average 10 to 15 years in the profession.

The highest proportion of transfers are requested from staff teaching academic subjects, who report discontent and stress levels much greater than teachers in practical subjects and trades education.

Staff teaching trades subjects normally have five or more years' experience in outside workplaces before starting in schools, a factor believed to contribute significantly to their capacity for coping with school tensions.

The head of the commission's regional office in Malmoe, Mr Gilbert Andersson, believes figures compiled for his Skaane Province (the southern part of Sweden), offer no explanation of causes behind teachers leaving the profession.

Marriage difficulties, deaths of near relatives, declining health faculties are some of the personal problems frequently quoted in stress cases in teaching. technical factors given are tion reforms, new instruction niques, pupil unrest and poor pupil-teacher relations.

In Mr Andersson's view the teachers who dropped out last year are a matter that should be brought to the attention of teachers, parents and pupils. It is argued that schools have been allowed to fall behind the pace of development in society, despite the fast innovation rate of Swedish education, providing a key cause of teacher frustration and stress.

"We need more teacher-pupil dialogue on the school's goals, clearly establishing real purposes. Behind our stress cases there has often been profound personal tragedy and both parents and pupils must be made aware of this," Mr Andersson said.

The jobs outlook for Swedish teachers switching to other areas of employment is good. They retain their full salaries providing they remain in the public sector.

The N and F debate

Cover job for inequalities?

ir,—I am, as parent, taxpayer and eacher, sick of the Schools Counil. It seems to be hell bent on eeping teachers preoccupied to the erge of distraction with schemes r altering everything. Perhaps at body has done some good in her ways, but the endless turmoil curriculum development and xaminations reform has now eached gale force with the huge nd expensive N and F promotion xercise.

Of course, a "feasible syllabus" n be produced to occupy any ggested fraction of A level time nd any such syllabus designed by bject experts is likely to be good, nd its debate therefore a waste of me. What has never been adeuately debated is the validity of e aims behind the proposals and hether it is sensible to abolish A vels even if those aims are ccepted.

im 1. "The growing size and bility range of the sixth form akes curriculum reform necesary." Yes, if I take on pig farmng as well as poultry I shall need extra equipment and foodstuffs; I shall not need to modify my hen houses, let alone pull them down. Growing size needs extra rooms and teachers; a wider ability range needs extra courses.

Aim 2. "Less specialization and broader study in the sixth form is desirable." Less and broader than what, and desirable for whom? Specialization is necessary and appropriate for those able and wishing to specialize; broader study should be available for those able to specialize and wishing to study broadly as well. Broader study may be possible for some not able to specialize and impossible for some others.

The "new sixth form" has a vastly greater range of types than the old academic sixth, and requires an even greater range of choices and standards of examination course than the old. The question is whether the existing exam courses offer a sufficient range, or whether the range should be extended, not whether the present breadth of exam opportunities should be curtailed by abolishing A levels. Insufficient notice seems to be taken of the breadth currently available in examined topics, apart from the non-examined studies usually indulged in. The phrase "five subjects instead of three" is wholly misleading at both ends of the assumption. The so-called "specialist" may well be taking physics, chemistry, biology and mathematics to A level, plus general studies and further English to A/O level, having already obtained good O level grades in nine or more subjects including history, geography, Latin, French, English language and literature, not to mention perhaps German, music, art, religious education and other less traditional subjects.

Some folk are narrow through choice, and a lot more, alas, through sheer inability to cope with more. A compulsory five "broad" N and F set-up could make life for the keen narrow specialist a misery and progress for the less broadly talented impossible, while restricting the activity and interest of the broadly very able. The present A level arts type can indulge in a biology O level if he hasn't got it; the A level scientist can study for an extra O level language, or history.

Of course this wide variety of choice is not available in the grammar school sixth forms, but in the huge new comprehensives all imaginable choices, including A levels, should be available, for that was one of the chief originally declared purposes of comprehensive schooling.

Regarding the other end of the "five for three" argument, it has been suggested that some sixth formers may be able to work for only one or two N levels in conjunction (or not) with CEE or O level examinations. The N and F breadth seems a little uncertain in its superiority to present choice.

Aim 3. "Subject choice should be made as late as possible to keep different career opportunities open." Again, what choice, how late, how possible, what opportunities and for whom? Some of the new sixth-formers will benefit little from breadth of subject, and some of these and others will be most use to the community and to themselves if they learn some trade, craft or skill as soon as possible and get on with earning a living by it. We have too many everlasting students already. Of course choice should be kept open as long as is socially and economically sensible (not as possible) for those who cannot choose, but the barber who wishes he was a lumberjack may still be a useful barber, and might never have been either if his choice had been delayed as long as possible—indeed, he would probably have become a sociologist and wished he were prime minister.

The awful truth, one suspects, is that examinations have to be devised to cover up the simple fact that a minority of the population is brighter than the rest. Schools are ceasing to be places of learning and are becoming part of the welfare service, social institutions for occupying the unemployed and the unemployable. We shall see RSLA to 18 very soon, and regional and ethnic quotas to every university, with "graduations" at all stages and everybody waving his worthless piece of paper.

If this is compromise, let's have more

Sir,—The Joint Examinations Sub-Committee of the Schools Council was able to consider your editorial of April 28 at its meeting this week.

Underlying the proposals—which are, as you rightly say, published to give time for all concerned to make known their views—is a belief that goodwill exists and that past experience has not been as uniformly depressing as you suggest. In particular, we should like to take up some specific points in your leader:

You write favourably of a sixth-form curriculum containing five subjects at one level and describe the two-level N and F schemes as a compromise designed by the council as a response to pressure from university and school teachers. We regard this response as evidence for the good sense and democratic working of the council, since in the first stage of the debate—based on Working Papers 45, 46 and 47—although a minority supported five equal subjects the majority gave their qualified support to a two-level pattern. All the evidence possessed by the council suggests that a proposal of the kind you favour would be heavily rejected but that there is a good chance of something like the N and F scheme's being generally accepted. If this is compromising, please can we have more of it?

Your editorial suggests that the needs of university students have dominated the thinking of JESC and that the role of N levels as instruments of general education has been ignored.

JESC considers that the relationship between N and F is rather different in fact. One of the major issues in teaching is the need to provide a suitable level of work for all the students. This will apply to N level groups as much as it has to A level students in the past. The suggestion is that N levels will be designed with syllabuses to represent a basic study of the subject, to meet the objectives of all the students and to provide a sound basis for F level.

N level, you suggest, will be trimmed "to the barest academic bones", and you link this with the view that "cramming" will result.

JESC feels that this is not the nature of N level as it has emerged from the syllabus studies and that most of the specimen syllabuses do not reflect this suggestion. The indications are that N level students will have followed syllabuses which within themselves will provide as broad a course as is appropriate for them.

It would have been easy to have laid down rigid rules, say, for example, the maximum number of F levels to be taken. This is not part, however, of our tradition and could impair that flexibility which is so characteristic of our system, and interfere with advising pupils, still the proper province of teachers.

It is, finally, not the complicated nature of the proposals which might delay the starting date of N and F levels. The delay is caused partly by the nature of the decisions required, partly by the need to develop syllabuses and then to teach them, partly by any decisions which may be made concerning 16-plus examinations, but mainly by virtue of the council's wish that all should express themselves at length over this issue.

We look forward to a continuing exchange of views and ideas. The council is most anxious to see a real debate on the basis of a close reading of the reports.

Keep the birch

Sir,—Your headline "EEC ruling swells caning protests" (April 28) is hardly correct. All you adduce thereafter is that STOPP is having another go with its boring irresponsible liberalism. Decrees of tolerance

Sir,—Michael Buckby, referring in his article "Now I know what I know", April 14, to the French Government's arrêté of December 28, 1976, raises the question "how tolerant are the exam boards?"

If he were to refer to the French Government's previous arrêté on this subject, dated February 26, 1901, he would find that the later document is little more than a reiteration of the earlier one, and that all the examples of usage he quotes in his article have in fact been tolerated since 1901.

Since teachers and course-book writers in this country (and Mr Buckby falls into both categories) have ignored the French Government's instructions for the last 77 years, isn't Mr Buckby being a little unreasonable in suggesting that the exam boards follow the more recent decree? Or does he think that exam boards should ignore what teachers do, and what teachers wish, by testing something which is not actually taught?

Sensitivities in Wales

Sir,—Aristides's paragraph, in your edition of April 28, about the Schools Council Committee for Wales ("Do not disturb"), gives an impression so misleading as to require correction.

The impression which Aristides gives is that the future of a Schools Council Committee for Wales is a sensitive issue concerning which some sort of evasive action was taken at the Governing Council meeting on April 20 and on which no fundamental decisions were made.

The real position is quite different. Neither the Committee for Wales nor the Schools Council Review Body nor the Governing Council has regarded arrangements for Wales as being an issue more sensitive than many others which have been discussed during the review period. And far from referring "the whole matter to the new council", the Governing Council on April 20 agreed on the composition and functions of a new Schools Council Committee for Wales, with nobody among the representatives of the many organizations present dissenting.

What was referred to the new Schools Council was consideration of certain aspects of the Committee for Wales substructure, and consideration of the financial arrangements for enabling the new Committee for Wales to carry out its increased responsibilities for Schools Council work in Wales.

In addition to being misleading, Aristides's paragraph is insulting. One can shrug off insult with the reflection that it may be an indispensable part of a stock-in-trade but one cannot as charitably dismiss inaccurate reporting.

Senior scales

Sir,—I have a good deal of sympathy with Mr Blackmore ("Senior on the pay slide", April 28) whose salary as a senior Education Officer has been overtaken by salaries of headteachers and advisers.

However, his final question is very easily answered. He asks what the NUT or NAS would say if a senior teacher or head of department in a school were paid more than the deputy head. In a Group 5 school this is precisely what can happen; the maximum salary of a Scale 3 teacher is £5,958, the Group 5 deputy on maximum will receive £5,865. The position is even more ridiculous in a Group 5 Special school, where the deputy will receive £198 less than a Scale 3 teacher.

The joint secretaries of Burnham, in their letter accompanying the new salary scales, note (with tongue in cheek?) that appointment to Group 5 deputy from Scale 3 is not a promotion, but a "sideways" move. By no stretch of the imagination is this true; such a move can only be a demotion.

I wonder how soon it will be before we arrive at the point where a Scale 3 teacher receives more than the head of his school. Perhaps this is what the NUT and NAS are aiming at.

Nursery courses for politicians?

Sir,—I am writing in sheer frustration and despair at the latest statement to emerge from Bromley Council, which determines the policies in an education authority not exactly renowned for being in the vanguard of respectable educational provision. It is the considered view of the Tory-controlled council that, "There is a lot of disagreement as to the advantages of nursery education" (Councillor Simon Randall, as quoted in the Beckenham Advertiser, April 27). This misinformation is the basis for the council's decision in making no provision for state nursery education.

Having lived in the Bromley area for four years, I am growing weary of such statements from ill-informed councillors, who obviously never catch sight of The Times Educational Supplement. Is it any wonder that the quality and extent of educational provision varies so enormously from authority to authority? It makes a farce of any argument to provide a comparable education throughout schools in the country by means of a core curriculum. I cannot help feeling that an in-service course in the rudiments of education for ill-informed politicians would be a more appropriate means.

Please would some energetic individual indicate to Bromley Council the wealth of research which is in agreement, and which clearly points to the advantages of nursery education? I fear my patience has run out!

Youth in the mainstream

Sir,—So the TES thinks a tiny experiment in political education by the National Association of Youth Clubs is barmy!

In the same issue ("Will youth work survive?", April 21), it is said that the youth service commands a tiny fraction of the education budget. On a part of this tiny fraction, and with the help of a substantially larger contribution from voluntary sources, NAYC is already engaged in political education with its members. It does this through weekend conferences and courses, in projects designed to offer young people experience in the decision-making process, and in many informal discussions in clubs and through youth projects throughout the country.

Some examples may be of interest. First, 200 members met at Bristol University to consider the nature and underlying causes of violence in our society and, this summer, another group will be discussing "When are we old enough?", a critical look at the transition to adulthood and the reasons for the close control that society keeps on this stage of young people's development. Second, to help adolescent girls understand the forces at work in society that operate to their detriment, and to find ways for them to become involved in the movement to bring about change, NAYC has, through residential pilot schemes, provided opportunities for nearly 300 girls to attend weekend conferences where these issues were explored.

A disturbing number of 600,000 members are unemployed and some have engaged in lobbying their MPs on unemployment issues. NAYC is attempting to respond to some of these needs by appointing one staff member to help prepare material for use by its members as they seek to take their place in society and to have some say in deciding what that place shall be. Many would say the expenditure is woefully inadequate and long overdue. I am amazed that a journal concerned with education seems to be unaware that youth clubs are no longer just about keeping the young amused but are located in the mainstream of positive, informal education.

Is it a moral question?

The ruling from Strasbourg that the use of the birch is 'degrading', and an assault on 'a person's dignity and physical integrity', has again focused attention on corporal punishment in schools. Here a probationary teacher describes his feelings about teaching in a school where every week two children are caned, five slippered, and forty smacked or hit for minor offences

Illustration by Micha

In the 10-year interim between leaving school and recently taking up teaching I had somehow assumed that corporal punishment had been phased out. So it came as something of a shock, while I was observing at a junior school before starting my teaching course to find seven-year-olds being caned for minor offences.

I found it puzzling that the headmaster spoke of himself as being towards the "progressive" side of education. Bringing the subject up with a couple of teachers, I was told by one that she could tell me from experience that any other approach was impractical. Angry that I didn't agree with her, she cited the example of a pupil of hers that had always forgotten to use full stops until she had been slapped on each occasion. When I meekly questioned this logic, I was asked by the other teacher if I thought that teaching was really for me!

Although I found this really depressing a talk with the headmistress of the adjoining infants school, who was appalled that her pupils would have to be subjected to this sort of punishment, allowed me to think that perhaps corporal punishment was limited to just a few schools. However, caning also took place once a week in the boys' comprehensive school where I undertook my teaching practice.

One item I remember, from glancing through the punishment book, concerned a boy who had been caned—in a school with no sex education of any kind—for "desecrating a library book with a drawing of a sexual nature". Again, as the all-male teachers were mostly from the former grammar school, I imagined this might be one of the last bastions using the cane.

The mixed comprehensive where I obtained my teaching post is situated in a poor area of the town, to which all the teachers commute. The children come to school from the rather drab council houses near by. Although I had attended what I had thought to be a "traditional" school, I was surprised at the rigid approach the teachers adopted here. The phrase I kept hearing them use to the children was "Why can't you behave like adults?". I hoped that comments I heard in the staff room like "I'm going to squash that child" and "He's a nothing boy" were just teachers letting off steam.

After a few days in the school, a girl of 13 came into my room at the beginning of a lesson crying her eyes out. Apparently she had been hit with a ruler by the religious instruction teacher, for playing around in his lesson. It took me all of 10 minutes to calm her down, while trying to organize a large class at the same time.

It upset me to see her sobbing so pitifully, and I felt angry that my lesson was being interrupted by another teacher's actions. Although I wanted to complain to the teacher concerned, I thought it best to remain silent, rather than cause resentment between me and the staff, and even risk jeopardizing my probationary year.

A few days after this I overheard two first-year girls excitedly re-living seeing a first-year boy caned by the same teacher in front of the class, as punishment for misbehaving. Apparently he had first been hit on the head, and screamed for the teacher to stop, whereupon he was hit with a cane on the buttocks.

I heard in the staff room that the boy's parents had complained about him being beaten. The teacher said that the boy had needed a good whacking, and the three members of staff involved in the conversation seemed indignant that the parents had complained. Later I discovered that the boy was being literally fought over at home by his separated parents, and this sometimes resulted in his running away.

I gradually discovered that these were not isolated cases, and that over 90 per cent of the staff caned, slippered, or smacked children personally or, in a few cases, sent them to the head, where they would often receive similar treatment. At a conservative estimate, weekly there are two children caned, five slippered and not less than 40 hit with a ruler, or soundly smacked for offences such as cheekiness, being out of bounds, talking in assembly, petty theft, and noisiness in the classroom.

All this might suggest that I teach in a school run by sadists. Yet, apart from a handful who openly preach that a "sound thrashing" will solve all the discipline problems in schools and the world outside, the staff are very pleasant people and, on the whole, seem concerned about the well-being of the children. However, the punitive approach seems to be accepted without any question by most, and any other approach is rejected as being unworkable.

Even those who relate somewhat guiltily in the staffroom that they may have hit a child too hard are absolved with cries of "good for you". The few staff who are unsure of using this approach seem intimidated by the general atmosphere and, whether through fear of being thought to be against the school, or not wanting to risk a 10-minute lecture from the "voice of experience", are denied an open discussion. The general diagnosis is that the liberal approach has failed, and a return to a stricter regime is needed.

By not using the cane, I run the risk of being thought lax in discipline by the staff, and being "soft" by the children: "Why don't you hit kids, sir?" "I just don't like hitting them". "Why are you a teacher then, sir?" Being a teacher is certainly made more difficult when practically everyone else is using mate deterrent".

I can understand why young conform to the system. At times I ting to fall in with everyone hinting that children might be sen head. What can you say to child have been told by a teacher that misbehave in any lesson that will be caned? How do you boy pleading with you to because he has been unruly?

No teacher can remain an find I have to keep a very low pro the subject — I get the uneas that openly admitting I was ag use of corporal punishment wo greeted with an awkward Although the British Isles are th part of Europe where corporal ment is legal, I'm sure I would ded as a crank.

A very worrying aspect of punishment in the school is the flouting of the local authority tions. I don't think any member is aware of their existence. I mana obtain a copy from another sour found that most incidences of punishment in the school broke the regulations, and many manag break them all!

To take just one example, a teacher who five or six times a hit children on the buttocks with a soll which hung on a large nail breaking all the regulations!

1. He was not delegated the power headmaster.
2. He used an instrument other than cane.

Ie did not keep the instrument out of it.

Corporal punishment frequently took e without the lapse of a reasonable e after the offence.

Girls were subject to corporal punisht without it being an exceptional

Girls were beaten by someone other n a woman teacher.

Corporal punishment took place in it of other pupils.

Another teacher was not present as itness.

The infliction of corporal punishment not entered into a punishment book.

Another teacher, who systematically pers children who forget to bring ysical education kit, can hardly say t he is carrying out his duty of making e that he does not exceed the kind punishment administered by a reasone and caring parent.

Although that is not typical behaviour the majority of staff, it puzzles me it a blind eye can be turned when occanally what can only be described as a lent assault takes place. From my own servations, and from overhearing children's conversations, this would usually pear to happen when teachers have emingly lost control and struck out mediately with hand, ruler or, in one se, knocking a child's head repeatedly ainst a wall.

One cannot forget the look of fright a child's face when this kind of incint happens. Until recently I would ive thought this kind of occurrence was tremely rare, but from my experiences the past few years I would say that is was not the case. Interestingly, when -pupils commit acts of violence in the cal community, these are treated with sgust.

The parents of children who have been eaten seem very reluctant to take any tion, other than verbally complaining, keeping the child away from school r a few days—even if there is physical idence of a blow. Of course, many arents inflict corporal punishment on eir children at home—and many of em are former pupils of the school. et members of staff will say that a upil "needs a damn good hiding", hen I know for a fact that he or she regularly beaten at home.

One teacher, while giving me the dvice of "clobbering" a particular boy, old me that the boy's father hit him all he time, but that we had to use punishent in the right way. My own "deterent" of occasionally keeping a child ehind after school was threatened when n outwardly tough boy broke down in ears, saying that his dad would get the tick out if he was late home!

Even teachers unsure about the moral questions surrounding the use of corporal punishment believe it is an effective immediate deterrent. (I was appalled when one teacher, after I wondered whether a child might not always be looking for an authority to tell him how to behave after leaving school for good, said that that was none of our business!)

However, children that have been beaten don't seem to learn their lesson, even in the short term, and come back for punishment time and time again. The chasm between staff and children becomes further widened by the growth of an underground community, in which to have been caned becomes a symbol of toughness.

A few teachers I have spoken to say, with some justification, that they have a full timetable and large classes, and that corporal punishment is a quick means to ensure discipline, as time for pastoral care is limited. Many staff, however, would resist the teacher moving any nearer to what they would see as a social work rule.

I find that counting up to 10 and having an honest exchange of views with a "disruptive" pupil can often produce effective results, and no repeat performance. If I really listen to what a child has to say, a compromise in our compulsory relationship can usually be reached, without recourse to any confrontation. But it's lonely work.

One of nature's spellers

Edward Blishen remembers some of his first classroom and playground experiences at his new infant school

My new school was Barley Road . . . less awful than Mabel Street, being single-storey. Building Mabel Street, they must have had fortresses, prisons in mind: the place was full of Gothic references. Barley Road was a rambling educational cottage: though like the other it was, for me, too inclined to stress the business of entering and leaving. There were so many doors, and such a ritual of penetration and escape to master. Watching films with Ruritanian settings, the point of which so often turned on the complex facilities available for smuggling oneself into castles and struggling out of them, I felt at home: it was just like school.

Inside, Barley Road at first was Miss Chadwinkle. She was very tiny, she seemed indeed to be one of us, dressed always in black, but wrapped rather than dressed. Her clothes made a small, kindly parcel of her. As a teacher she was totally empirical. That is to say, we were encouraged, in the matter of counting, in the bold use of matchsticks and fingers.

She had cut-outs of all the letters of the alphabet, and these we moved about bodily fitting them together to make our guesses at words. Miss Chadwinkle, whose name gave us such delight that we left it as it was, almost—in a hurry, she was The Winkle—was wholly opposed to abstraction. There was the feeling that, given the chance, she would have made all knowledge tangible and portable. History itself could be turned into a sort of matchsticks . . . well, dates hung about the room, sometimes with no legend to account for them. So if you turned from what had become the pure manual labour of counting or spelling, your eye might be met by an urgent sheet of cardboard that simply shouted: 1066.

I was beginning to have that idea of yourself, as a dangerously exposed public person, that you're given by the need to write your name on the outside of an exercise book. At Barley Road an exercise book was used with great economy. So, at one end it would announce itself as an English book: turned upside down, and working from the other end, it would be an Arithmetic book.

For Arithmetic you earned great blue-pencil knots, "R's" for Right: or, of course, blunt crosses for Wrong. In all subjects you had your Excellent, or your VG for Very Good, or G for Good or F for Fair, or S for Satisfactory. (How tepid that S was! Worse than FG for Fairly Good, and in some ways less preferable even than Poor, which was always spelled out). Then there were your marks out of ten. You were always being stamped, in this complicated fashion, assessed and placed.

I was soon aware of having the Barley Road seal of approval. I was one of nature's spellers. Had spelling not existed, this was the impression, I should have invented it. Put me in front of a picture and ask me to describe it—it was a favourite way of getting composition going—and I'd respond with a meticulous report, like a small policeman: beginning, "In the picture I can see . . ." ("One little girl has a white overall on. The other little girl has a blue overall on").

We were barely out of Miss Chadwinkle's before we'd taken the soul-changing step from pencil to ink. On the middle finger of my right hand is still visible the distortion around the nail that resulted from becoming a young master of the inkpot at the age of six and a half. The metal of the nib-holder impressed itself, with the intensity of my grip on the pen. It made a hollow that was always black with school ink. I was altogether, in some deep sense, black with ink.

I became an adept at Transcription which, in 1927, as a surviving exercise book proves, was an exercise given to the most tender, who were required to print this word at the top of the page. (I had not yet learned to join up my writing. "He joins up" was another fine thing to have said about one, when the time came.) "Transcription", I guess, was copying from the blackboard.

Teachers are strange people! How curious to make no effort to translate this technical term for the understanding of its tiny users. We might as well have headed the page with some such word as "Tergiversation". . . . Except that I suspect the human ink-blot I had become might have enjoyed that.

Briefly, incredulously, under Miss Thrift for Arithmetic, I ran out of favour. Not for my work, but for that other great compartment of oneself, its existence revealed by the busy paperwork produced by the school: one's Conduct. In this area I was perfect until I met Miss Thrift. She was an impatient woman, and choleric—not unlike my father: and perhaps it was this similarity that made me do, in her class, what I was already in trouble for doing at home.

"One thing I can't stand", my father would say, "is bloody giggling". My mother and I, alas, were bloody gigglers. I think it would not have helped if we'd laughed frankly and aloud, instead of giggling, at those junctures which my father viewed as unsuitable ones. He would still have been angry. But it was for giggling that he pointed his square and excommunicating finger at us. "Get out!" (It was I who had to leave the room—but there was no doubt that I was being exiled for the crimes of both.)

Something about Miss Thrift's own ready angers made me giggle: and the knowledge that it was dangerous to giggle made it worse. She must have felt I was fooling her to the top of my bent. Anyway, she beat me, and I'd go back to my seat and giggle, and she'd beat me again, all in a sort of nervous daze. Indeed, it was the nervous thrashing the nervous. I find it horribly easy to remember how the hands grew puffed and red, great painful cushions.

How strange, again, teachers are! Caning on the hands was common throughout the school—and odd, very odd, when you think that our hands were the prime tools with which we were expected to work. . . .

The playground at Barley Road was firmly divided. For a brief period, while we were in Miss Chadwinkle's care, some sort of innocence was presumed that made it acceptable for us to play together, boys and girls. But as soon as we were into ink and exhibiting other signs of ominous maturity, like joining up our letters, we were divided, and the division was expressed in solid terms, as walls. It was as if the girls suddenly took veils . . . of blue engineering brick.

It was great, and it was horrible, to be promoted to the boys' playground. Great because we all accepted the view that promiscuous contact with girls would cause a sensational decline in our manliness. Horrible because I didn't, when it came to the point, much care for being manly. Or rather, I wanted to be able to make a selection among those acts and habits that were identified as masculine.

All right, games with your "faggies". That was playing with cigarette cards, in any of three or four different fashions. Your enemy cocked his cards against a wall, and you flicked at them, taking those you knocked down. Or you flicked with the aim of covering cards already lying there. It was, in effect, a series of ways of bringing about an increase or decrease in the number of "faggies" you possessed.

It was the nearest, I think, I've been to knowing how it is to be a millionaire, or totally down-and-out. There were times in the 1920s when I had such quantities of cigarette cards as I swoon about, even as a memory. I was one of your bloated cigarette card-owners. I've known, too, what it is to be down to half a dozen caricatures of lesser members of the Australian cricket team, 1928.

Playing with "faggies" was gentle enough, even for a child like myself, virtually born with kid gloves on. So were such games as "airplanes". In "airplanes" you simply were . . . airplanes. Cap back to front, arms outstretched. A friend to swing your propellor—actually, your tie.

"Contact", he called, and you stuttered and vibrated before allowing the engine to come fully alive: half a turn, a bit of taxi-ing, and you were airborne, in a cluster of tense-faced aircraft arbitrarily given to ramming each other or shooting each other down ("Go on—you're in flames!" "I'm not!" "You are!" "Fred saw me! I put in twenty bursts! Didn't I put in twenty bursts, Fred?").

Some of the consequences of playing airplanes could be nasty, but could be avoided, as they were by myself and other milder boys, by keeping to the air-lanes alongside the wall of the girls' playground.

But I didn't like not being able to go to the lavatory, sit down, without being turned into an exhibition. There were no locks on the doors. You'd sit there, praying, but they'd come crashing in, the big boys, running the whole length of the lavatories, throwing doors open with immense cries of "Poppy show! Poppy show!" They'd have smaller followers, who'd shout, "Take a look at that!"

They struck me as having knowledge and experience of quite an appalling kind, lying behind these exclamations of theirs. It was the sort of mysterious acquaintance with things that dictated another of their habits—of running through the playground, demanding: "How many balls you got?" I knew the accepted answer was two, and would provide it rapidly—the convention was that failure to answer such questions was punishable with punches—but I didn't know why it was the answer. I didn't know about balls.

Urban triptych

Jack Cross on three new Open University readers

Urban Education; Books 1, 2 and 3. The City Experience. Edited by John Raynor and Elizabeth Harris.

Schooling in the City. Edited by John Raynor and Elizabeth Harris.

The Political Context. Edited by Peter Ruggatt and Merrill Evans.

Ward Lock Educational £8.00 and £3.80 each.

In front of such compilations as these the reviewer faces the sort of problem which confronts a discriminating glutton determined to get the best value out of a buffet loaded with familiar and more exotic dishes; where to start? The books contain 76 discrete papers. These deal with a variety of related themes, use a multiformity of styles, are of unequal nutritional value.

For the Open University student guidance is available. These are readers which serve the third-level course "Education and the Urban Environment" in which they are complemented by correspondence texts and radio and television programmes which are to run for three years. It is worth noting that the correspondence texts are available to anyone and can be bought from many bookshops, ordered directly from the Open University or borrowed from public libraries. Education Study students are expected to devote about 10 hours per week in active application to all this material.

What of the general reader, interested in modern education but unable to undertake this degree of concentrated study? He will find a great deal of value in these books though I suggest that he uses the three tables of contents as his carte, selecting items from it according to his taste and the demands of his digestion.

These companion volumes provide commentaries on the social processes which ferment in the urban setting, on the educational arguments which are involved in trying to make schools fit conjectured needs and on the economic and political factors which influence the debate. In their general introduction the editors point out how the focus of attention has changed since an earlier course on the subject was prepared five years ago. They are now much more concerned with the plight of the inner-city areas, the allocation of declining resources, cultural dislocation and the situation of minorities in an increasingly hostile interracial environment.

The City Experience begins with a coolly ironic essay by Kenneth Galbraith on the historical development of our contemporary polyglot metropolis. It contains one social (or socialist?) diktat; "A unified, overall conception for streets, offices, shops, houses, parks, will almost always be better than where there is no governing order at all".

On the other hand Richard Sennet, in a provocative paper on "The good uses of a city", advocates abolishing virtually all centralized planning; even police control of public disorders should be curbed.

Thus disparate individuals and groups would be forced, doubtless in conditions of great tension and unease, to come to terms with their own nature and that of social power. H. J. Gann analyses how ways of life differ in the inner and outer city and the suburbs. Edward Banfield discusses behavioural and attitudinal variations in the social classes. Colin McInnes offers a sketchy and superficial "Portrait of a working-class culture" which might serve to reinforce the opinions of Professor Bantock as expressed in volume two. One contribution on this theme is outstanding. Dennis Johnson starts, "I work in a factory. For eight hours a day, five days a week, I'm the exception to the rule that life can't exist in a vacuum". This can be read on its own for its vigour and telling power, as for its relevance to more academic studies found elsewhere in these books.

Schooling in the City has a keynote essay by Stuart Hall which might easily have found its place in the third book of the series. In absoluate contradiction to the (ostensible) official attitude he maintains that "Education can be thought of as the pursuit of politics by other means". A Schools Council statement contains the remark that "every hue in the spectrum of educational ideologies can be found in the same staff room". Most of them find representation in this work. Early papers look at some of the criticisms levelled against our contemporary urban schools. Peter Newsam points to the imprecision of the methods by which we believe we measure "standards" and the politicized misjudgments which can be made as a result. Rhodes Boyson's contribution, characteristically enough, entertains no such temporizing uncertainties.

There are several descriptions of community-based education in Britain and the United States. Four papers tackle the race problem as it affects schools; unhappily the writers tend to agree that no authority anywhere has yet produced a coherent strategy to deal with it. Richard Sennet (see The City Experience) would probably say that they shouldn't try. G. H. Bantock continues to insist, as powerfully and succinctly as ever, that "caught between the contrary demands for quality and equality in our country we have opted for the latter". Taken as a whole this volume provides a reasonably balanced overview of the current situation and neatly correlates declarations of principle, techniques of evaluation, personal anecdote and suggestions for improved curricular design.

The third book looks at education in The Political Context though it has been pretty firmly situated there most of the time. A. H. Halsey expresses its basic concern, about "the coll belief in education either best investment of national tion or the great redistribu chances to the traditionally advantaged".

There are divergent stat about the causes and effects o inequality and whether edu can, or should, be expected anything to relieve it. Chri Jencks produces evidence America and Holland to sh schools can do little to red nitive inequalities or act as ments of social change. Two remind us that the class has social and cultural as economic aspects: ("The riat have become a race apart"—Engels). The case for tive discrimination and the accountability (are these to key topics of the seventies examined, the latter in rel the William Tyndale School article by Robin Auld, QC. tising teachers, particularly will be interested in the deba autonomy, centralized curricu the changing role of manage is a tough-minded antholo leaves the educationist excuse for complacency.

These three books together a picture of a complex and c tious scene—a triptych perhap serious inquirer will receive benefit by using them concurr chasing a chosen theme throug three volumes and juxtapos lated ideas which are pre under different titles.

Between care and control

Geoffrey Parkinson

Representation in the Juvenile Court. By Richard Anderson.

Routledge and Kegan Paul £2.95. 7100 8757 8.

Visitors to juvenile courts are soon likely to be bored: for one thing it is exceedingly difficult to grasp exactly what is going on. Much of the business seems to be transacted in whispers. Probation officers and social workers glide around sliding pieces of paper hither and thither, the occasional policeman in uniform usually looks slightly ill at ease and lawyers with a weakness for the grand style have often been known to peter out in monosyllabic confusion as their forensic stance is unsupported by those around them.

Of course there are variations and I suppose it would be true to say that, all in all, the more interesting the court from an observer's point of view, the less effective its proceedings are likely to be. Richard Anderson, a sociologist, has taken some considerable trouble to discover two courts with widely differing points of emphasis for an interesting research project into the field of defendant representation.

Court A in the North of England clearly sees itself as serving a law-enforcing function and in many respects is merely a mini-magistrates court. This reveals itself in its sentencing policy, in the rigidity of its rituals and in the hierarchy of responses to those that appear before it. Lawyers and probation officers are, for example, held in higher regard than social workers who are seen as having "a very subjective ethos" and prone to place the interests of their clients above those of the Court.

Court A is compared rather unfavourably with Court B situated in London, which sees welfare as its prime objective and criminality as, in the main, a symptom of distress. In this second court social workers are privileged to interrupt proceedings when they feel that there are matters that need clarification and their insights are a fundamental cornerstone of all the decisions that are made by the Bench. To all intents, the magistrates are a panel of welfare assessors.

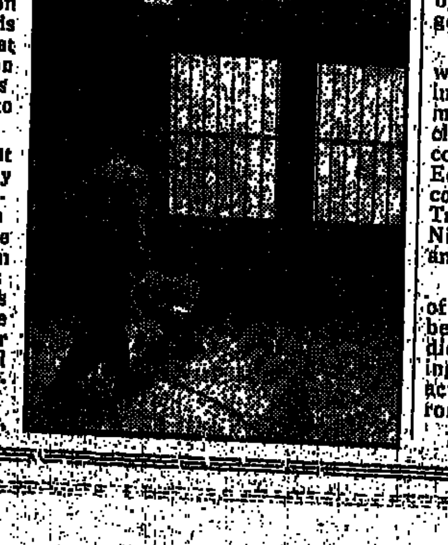
Probably most juvenile courts fall between the two extremes of "care" and "control" described by Anderson but for this very reason his study effectively highlights many problems that remain unresolved within the field of juvenile justice, reflecting both public and legislative confusion towards young offenders.

In spite of the nature of Court B's general outlook, Anderson notes that the concept of welfare has many areas that are open to question and he quotes a solicitor from Court A who observes that "a degree of formality is essential. The danger of informality is that there is a concentration on methods of disposal and this encourages one to take the facts at face value". Certainly Anderson shows that social worker reports are often ill-designed and unable to meet serious challenge.

But perhaps the most important issue lies in the fact that what may seem "welfare" to a Bench frequently appears persecutory to a young defendant. Whatever the issues, the defendant's central aim is to get things over as quickly as possible and in the end retain his freedom. Within this context the lawyer and the social worker appear as though from outer social space, to offer their services. Lawyers tend to focus on the facts of the offence and, when necessary, mitigation for freedom even often where this appears to militate against the assumed needs of "wel fare".

Social workers, on the other hand, are more aware of social and individual pathology and so their attitude towards their clients' demand for "freedom" may be a complex one. Young defendants and their parents invariably judge both lawyers and social workers solely by their ability to avoid the passing of a custodial sentence. And so we see that though a Court and its caring advisors may feel that, for example, a Borstal sentence may offer both character and trade training, inevitably if loss of freedom is inevitable, a young offender will seek the shorter but, on the surface, more negative experience of a detention centre. Furthermore he may respond positively to a "short sharp shock" because on some level or other he regards it as "fair".

The conflict between the interests of society and the welfare of the young offender will probably never be totally resolved. But perhaps above both "control" and "caring" the concept of "fairness" (for all its inexactness) must be paramount if Juvenile Courts (and indeed all courts) are to retain the respect of the communities they serve.



Tales of a political Crawfie

Patricia Rowan

Margaret Thatcher: a Tory and her Party. By Patrick Cosgrave.

Hutchinson £5.50. 09 131380 5.

With friends like Patrick Cosgrave, Margaret Thatcher hardly needs the Labour Front Bench and Edward Heath as enemies. With some repute among the right-wing intelligentsia of journalism—admittedly a smallish mafia—it is disappointing to find her speech-writer come on more like a Westminster Crawfie.

It scarcely does his leader a service to make the contents of her dressing case seem as important as the brief case. There is a danger that we won't plough through the problems of fine hair and neat dressing in the first chapter on The Women to the heavier later chapters about what goes on inside her head. Could the same audience who understands about those notorious hair rollers even know what he means by "libertarian radical" when we get down to the political philosophy?

He seems confused himself as to whether she is the bold challenger in shining armour, or the fragile maiden in need of protection. Other characters in the leadership battle come in for his purple passages too: Edward du Cann's "dark good looks, considerable oratorical skill"; Peter Tapsell "brave and independent"; Nicholas Ridley "tall, fair, charming and a distinguished painter."

Even the blow-by-blow account of the battle itself—which would be more riveting if Mr Cosgrave didn't irritate and confuse by jumping about chronologically—is characterised as "this first stage of her romantic journey".

But Margaret Thatcher is not a romantic heroine. She is thing much more formidab anyone who wants to know sort of prime minister she make will find plenty of on other pages of this split ality of a book. Patrick Cos may be too close to her to back for a whole view, but he talked to her enough to know she believes.

Not the sort of woman clubbable with her colleagues has used her time in politi work and think hard. Though disagreed with Heath on fin policies (should she have res before the crush?) she suspe that it all began to go wrong Macmillan's "you've never h so good". She believes with monetarists that public spen should be cut on principle, not as a temporary measure.

And what of education if comes to power? Though this her only major government post material is thin here, presum because Cosgrave was not at her feet then. There are one nuggets: Heath found her a a nag in Cabinet, and even "her inability to run the DES out exciting damaging contro was a considerable handicap".

For the rest we know most already: the early unpopul when she cut school milk and Labour policy on comprehen into reverse; her success in money for primary and schools and raising the leaving age, and subsequent nance of her department. There a coherent philosophy to which should be borne in mind the future—everything in educ should be done for pedagogic than for social reasons (which one reason why she was so pointed with the report of Bullock Committee which she up before she left office).

Otherwise the evidence about her mind is confusing. Cosgrave admi the clinical thinking that come from her early training as accountant and research chemi but reveals another romantic, patriotic, strain. The authors have made the most impression her, apart from Hayek and Solshen syn, are Richard Hillary and Ki ling.

tical Parties: A Genuine Case Discontent? By Jean Blondel.

dwood House £6.50. 7045 0321 2. 5. 0256 9.

hin the discipline of politics e is a long drawn-out debate the utility of political ing. Does it—or indeed can it stil a quintessence that can be ned into recommendations? Can tical knowledge make up for of political experience? wers to these questions may be ned from these three books ned by a soldier, by a conference of jurists and by a professor government.

t-General Ocran, now retired, one of the Ghanaian Army icers involved in the coup d'etat ich overthrew Nkrumah in 1967. is a personal memoire of "milli y involvement in Ghana and of problems of military govern nt". The academic quality of unique document is under itten by the admiring tone of ofessor S. E. Finer's introduc n. It is practical, well written d wise. Ocran's thesis is more n interesting. While military vernments are not bad per se and ilian governments are not good r se, there are nonetheless factors limiting military government and inhibiting its performance. Ocran, like de Gaulle, is more by far than a simple soldier.

Collections of conference working documents rarely promise much, even on so important a topic as human rights in a one-party state. The recommendations of the Conference of International Jurists, held in 1976 at Dar es Salaam, are as realistic as they are succinct and as depressing as they are realistic. Preventive detention, maladministration and restrictions on information are, they assume, endemic to the modern state. As a check on the worst excesses a series of ombudsman-type institutions are proposed.

Professor Blondel's previous studies—particularly Voters, Parties and Leaders (1963) and Public Administration in France (1964) were huge successes. Political Parties is a huge disappointment. In part this is due to the ambition of his task. It is also due to failure to use new data on political parties to test old theories. Little is revealed on such issues as the "iron law of oligarchy", raised by Michel in his Political Parties (1915) and scant attention is paid to Maurice Duverger's distinction between élite and mass parties developed in Les Partis politiques (1951). While R. T. Mackenzie's thesis of structural similarity between Labour and Conservative parties remains a furrow unploughed by Blondel.

Two fundamental defects—one of logic, the other of language—mar this book. The author avoids definitions on the curious ground that "a definition of political parties is not easily discovered". Thus he accepts as "political party" every phenomenon reckoned as such by others. And they are legion. Predictably, therefore, the attempts at generalization bound forth as bet-hedging banalities. For instance: "Modern regimes of almost every type are therefore partly moulded by political parties which may emerge naturally in some countries and which may have been engineered in others" and "parties are pillars of the social structure in both East and West".

The second error lies in attributing personality to political parties. This leads the writer to assert—rather charmingly—that they omit things, disappoint people, care little, succumb to demands and even—horrible dictu—fall asleep. Only in a metaphorical sense is this possible. And anthropomorphism is surely more than a venal sin in the field of government studies?

This study has little to recommend it. Too abstract for the general reader, of little practicality to the party worker and too speculative for the sixth former, it is equally too loosely conceived for the academic political theorist. And, forsooth, failure to cite sources mars the interesting comparative tables he presents. Never has a work by a professor of politics been more richly deserving of the wooden spoon.

The three Rs—Roman style

Elizabeth Henry

Education in Ancient Rome. By Stanley Bonner.

Methuen £9.50. 416 79710 5. £5.90. 85710 8.

Narrowly literary, with its unmanageable numbers and its exclusion of experimental science, Roman education looks like a dead horse. Even the literary study was often pedantic, and the use of the native language was taught by exercises in declamation which could be so unreal that they touched on the bizarre. Discipline was hard, the father's authority absolute. Spinning for girls.

These dismissive statements about Roman education are all true, and Bonner provides reference material for them which is full and clear and interesting. But he also presents elements in Roman education which go far outside the crude account just given.

"Educare" in Latin is a word of richer content than "educate", which as Bonner says is "erudire" (he does not pause to note the fallacy of connecting "educare" with "drawing out"). Education for the Roman was "concerned with human relationships, with perseverance amid difficulties, and with the home as well as the school". Study of the spoken and then of the written word was supremely important, as the means of human communication. All technologies were secondary (though very seriously pursued by some, as Vitruvius shows, without rejecting the literary training of the majority). Mothers as well as fathers were deeply involved in the education of their children; Octavian's mother discussed her son's work and his general conduct with his tutors every day, and many parents liked to supervise homework.

In aiming at character-training and a traditional literary culture, Roman education was like that of the Hebrews, the Greeks, even the Egyptians. It was unique in the ancient world in requiring (after the second century BC) fluency in a foreign language and familiarity with a foreign as well as the native literature. Some of the most interesting passages in Bonner's book concern the teaching of Greek (through systematic grammar-study, by vocabulary learning from topical lists, and through conversation).

This is a work of scholarship, remarkable for its range and detail (though it ends, unfortunately, before the generation of Marcus Aurelius). The illustrations are unusual and always pertinent, and there is a valuable bibliography. Is Bonner's assumption of modern relevance in this literary discipline perhaps a little too easy? The question deserves debate.

p the Road and Back. By John compton.

ne of Barney's Girls. By Tom rowne.

ly Makes a Change. By Jenny ewitt.

acmillan 45p each.

She drew back the covers and ulled up his nightshirt . . . and eld the bottle in one hand and his wing in the other. . . ." Such a mbination of fantasy, gratuitous dery and teenage mag banality—oupled with sensitivity, wisdom and mpassion of the best adolescent terature—seems to be the hall ark of so many Topliners. The ffect is that of a pop concert set a cathedral crypt. If young eople are hooked on sex and iolence, then let 'em have a dollop arge enough to sugar the pill.

Follow my Leader is the best of he bunch (and it's interesting to ote that the better productions re often devoted to younger aders. This one would suit 12 to 4 year olds.) Stan is run down y a car that doesn't stop. An old ll mate of Eric's dad rolls up th nowhere to go. He moves into e house and proceeds to drink himself and Eric's dad under the table and down to the basement to cast his hard-earned savings on to the waters of shady double deals. Hans-Eric Hellberg scrapes the scum off the barrel of misery and comes up with the elements of modern domestic tragedy.

Apart from the fact that the kids have no trouble in tracking down a car which the police have failed to find, this tale of guilt, demon drink and devil aggression is both thrilling and believable. Written in short, sharp lines with a fine idiomatic translation (by Joan Tate), this book makes excellent easy reading.

Most of the thrills in Up the Road are those involving the opposite sex. Our hero departs like the young Tom Jones in search of an easy lay in Scotland. And if he concludes that "bed isn't all it's about", we are not to know that until the final pages. (Incidentally, he is not over successful.) The style has a crude but engaging naivety and the simple narrative has the touch of experience. Despite a detailed thinness of plot, a tendency to provide too much information and an irritating diffidence about using words with more than one syllable, John Crompton captures the ordinary excitement of a young man ranging onto widening horizons.

One of Barney's Girls is not a fifties single but a tale about nurses (Barney = St Barnabas). Getting bed making, blanket baths, bed pans and bedded, it reads like a Plain Girl's Guide to Nursing. Tom Browne has no trouble making it fun. There are lots of male doctors to sweep you off your feet and provide a bundle of running jokes whenever your interest looks like flagging. Which it does occasionally. This one also swoops down from time to time into the pits of banality. All the same, you get a lively and (for all I can tell) authentic account of hospital life and the final pages stir up the drama with all systems go.

The wooden spoon for titles goes to Sally makes a Change—a three tier love affair on the perils of sophisticated boy friends. If ordinary is beautiful, this tale is very beautiful indeed. But apart from reinforcing sexist attitudes (why is it always the women who make the tea and clean the house?), it has the honest ring of teenage hangups and enough coy sex to keep the attention. Much of it is funny in a ghastly sort of way as the morals are handed round like doughnuts.

Inside story

Honest Rogues. Ride a Cock Horse. For King or Commons. By Harry T. Sutton.

Heritage Books for the National Trust 85p each.

This new series represents a worthy attempt by the National Trust to glamorize its properties and encourage children to visit them. Each small volume tells an "inside story" about an historical theme; these three are about smuggling, stage-coaches and the struggles between King and Parliament.

Each is constructed to a formula. First there is a story, apparently fictional but concluding with information showing it is based on historical fact. The central section contains snippets of background knowledge about the subject—the tactics of smugglers and revenuers, horse-drawn transport in the nineteenth century, details about the Civil War—all written in a direct and anecdotal style. Finally, the reader is invited to "See Where it Happened"; details are given of some of the places held by the Trust and which have connections with the theme of the book.

Digging

Colin Crewdson

Approaches to Archaeology* By Peter J. Fowler

A. and C. Black £6.50. 0 7136 1747 0.

What do archaeologists do? They dig up skeletons, discover treasure and sometimes uncover stone buildings. Lying unquietly beneath much modern popular understanding of archaeology, these old bones still have the power to rattle archaeologists' nerves, the more so when they should have been decently buried (and recorded) a long time ago.

There has never been enough discussion about the uses and abuses of archaeology, its objectives, or attitudes towards it, informed, uninformed or misinformed: Peter Fowler's book is an intelligent and comprehensive tour of the present difficulties and anomalies of this no longer nascent science. Witty, lucid, confident, he sets about the mental inertia that can befog the brain of even the sharpest archaeologist, let alone that of the layman, who may be supposed to be a little misty-eyed with romanticism as well.

Peter Fowler believes that archaeology has been led astray in the mad rush of Rescue: long-range planning based on a total survey of the landscape, through field walking, aerial photography, and sampling techniques, could obviate this chaos, where financial considerations have not. The excavational expertise of archaeology could then be put to proper scientific use in throwing light on problems needing this sort of treatment. If archaeology is a science, what on earth is it doing scrabbling around under the muddy blade of the bulldozer?

Archaeological data, or historical remains, touch most of us in some way or another; science touches but a select few—what then is the role of the majority of archaeologists in this country, the amateurs, in this rationalized discipline that needs so much reshaping? What of the role of the county publications? How can local knowledge be used to best advantage? How much should archaeologists excavate? Should they excavate at all?

Peter Fowler treats his readers as intellectual equals in presenting his arguments. Approaches to Archaeology is neither a simple nor an introductory book; but it is a book that needed to be written—and read.

tudies in Ancient Society. Edited y M. I. Finley.

Routledge and Kegan Paul £2.50. 100 8901 5.

Neither of these books is new: Pro essor Hammond's is a further re printing of the second edition (1967) of a now-standard history ut was first published in 1959; hile the collection of essays edi ed by Professor Finley, now mak ng its first appearance in paper ack, came out originally in 1974 as composite volume in the Past and Present Series under the general ditorship of Trevor Aston. Both ooks display a calibre of scholar hip that makes their reemergence n whatever format both welcome nd well worth saluting.

The mastery of his material that informs every section of Professor Hammond's 650-page history makes it all the more impressive on re-acquaintance. A problem in any long-breathed work of this order must always be that of stylistic level. Pitch it too high at the start and it will prove both fatiguing for the reader and difficult to sustain in the writing. Professor Hammond wisely opted from the beginning for a direct, expository manner which nevertheless rises to eloquence at appropriate moments, as in his eulogy of Plato's versatility and grace of expression or in his assessment of Socrates's character and, a few pages later, in his account of his trial and death.

The narrative stamina that carries Professor Hammond imperturbably from 6000BC to 322BC, his patent love of the ancient world and its nobler values, as well as the unfussy accessibility of his profound learning all blend in a book that is certain to prove a source of instruction and delight for a whole new generation of students — at every level.

Professor Finley's volume binds together papers spanning nearly a thousand years of Graeco-Roman history. Though disparate in subject matter (it is a far cry from the "Athenian Demagogues" discussed by Professor Finley himself to the "Peasant Revolts in Late Roman Gaul and Spain" considered by E. A. Thompson) they are linked by their common "structuralism" — in practice if not in theory. This insistence on viewing institutions (and their progressive modifications) squarely within the social frameworks of the specific eras in which they flourished roots all the contributors in relevance and good sense.

Especially interesting is the sequence of articles on the Early Christian Persecutions, G. E. M. de Ste Croix's emphasising, in an extended paper, that the central Roman objection to the Christian phenomenon was to its "godlessness" (ie, its shunning of normal civic obligations to local deities) is challenged by A. N. Sherwin-White in a much briefer article.

However, his "Amendment", which contends that proscription of the Christian cult was more commonly triggered by its alleged connexion with crimes and immoralities—flagitia, scelera, maleficia—is itself vigorously counter-attacked by Mr de Ste Croix. He points out that the early Christians' own intolerance of all other religions (as opposed to the easy, happy-go-lucky and peaceful coexistence of the various brands of contemporary paganism) made it very difficult for the Empire to tolerate them. This series is rounded off by a fine paper from W. H. C. Frend on "The Failure of the Persecutions in the Roman Empire". It is altogether a most absorbing collection.

Studies with Uncle Sam

FRANCES HILL on a Resources Centre for American studies

Too many schoolchildren still think of American culture in terms of cowboys and Indians. As part of an effort to broaden and deepen the British understanding of United States, history, politics, technology, population and culture, the United States government two years ago made a generous bicentennial grant to the Polytechnic of Central London to set up a Resources Centre for American Studies.

One of only two in the country, the centre runs conferences and short courses for teachers and sixth-form pupils, provides reference library facilities, lends audio-visual aids, makes arrangements for visiting speakers for schools, and answers enquiries from teachers.

One of the centre's chief functions is to help teachers whose pupils are working for the new Associated Examining Board O and A levels in American Studies. (The exam is proving popular: 500 candidates will take it this year.) It also provides help and resources for teachers giving courses in American Studies as a non-examined subject.

Mr Christopher Brookeman, senior lecturer in English and American Studies at the Polytechnic of Central London programme director of the Resources Centre, says the centre aims to shift people into the study of groups other than cowboys and Indians and to encourage the study of a range of topics such as the rise of America as a world power, American cities, American technology.

The polytechnic was chosen, out of a number of applicants, to receive the United States government three-year grant of $22,000 partly because some of its departments, such as its school of communication and film school, provided facilities for the centre to make use of and build on, and partly because of its convenient location near Oxford Circus tube station, London. The polytechnic has no American Studies department as such, which was seen as an advantage by the United States agencies which administer the funds. It has no internal requirements to hamper its flexibility in providing a service for schools.

The centre is open on Tuesdays and Wednesdays in term time, from 10 until 6.30, for visits by appointment from teachers and groups of pupils.

The centre's stock of materials, mainly built up over the past year, include tape slide programmes, videos, cassettes, maps and charts. They cover topics such as Afro-American studies, United States art and architecture, geography, government and politics and American history.

The centre receives about 45 inquiries from teachers and colleges of education lecturers each week. Some are sent on by the American embassy, with which the centre cooperates closely; others come direct. Teachers often ask to be sent "anything" on a certain period or topic says Mr Brookeman

Rather than merely bundling a parcel of materials into the post, he usually writes offering curriculum advice. He may call on colleagues within the polytechnic, attached to the centre as consultants, for specialized advice in subject areas other than his own. Materials are never sent to pupils, and letters from pupils are not answered directly. Mr Brookeman will get in touch with the pupil's teacher to offer help and advice.

The centre will find speakers for schools through the American embassy or may refer the school to the Central Bureau for Educational Visits and Exchanges. It "gets access to all visiting Americans", Mr Brookeman says. The American embassy take a keen interest in the centre's activities; the cultural attaché, Mr Irving Sublosky, is on its advisory panel. But there are no pressures to purvey pro-American propaganda, Mr Brookeman says.

Conferences and courses run by the centre have recently included a weekend course on plantations, cities and politics in the United States South, and a one-day conference on science and technology in the United States in the twentieth century which was held at the College of St Mark and St John in Plymouth. For this the American embassy provided materials on the pioneering effort of the space programme, including some of its failures.

The Polytechnic has an extensive long-established "short course" programme, under which all the administrative arrangements for the centre's courses and conferences are made. It is keen to arrange more courses in the regions, sending its speakers "on the road" to reach teachers who, in these times of financial stringency, cannot often raise the funds from their local education authorities to get up to London.

Film shows and exhibitions on America Studies topics are held regularly at the Polytechnic.

The Polytechnic has been awarded a Fulbright Fellowship for 1978-81 to enable a visiting scholar from the United States, William Issel of San Francisco State University, to take part in the American Studies programme.

The Centre's grant from the United States government expires in 1979. But United States financial support for the centre is to continue, probably on the same sort of scale as at present.

Details of all the centre's activities, and advice and information for teachers of American Studies, can be obtained from Christopher Brookeman, Polytechnic of Central London, 309 Regent Street, London, W1R 8AL.

World Religions: Buddhism in Asia
World Religions: Islam

Hugh Baddeley Productions, 8 Brampton Road, St Albans, Herts AL1 4PW. £3.60 each, including VAT and postage.

Now that comparative religion has become one of the commonest elements of many religious education syllabuses, there is a need for materials that give some sense of what it might be like to be a member of a particular religion or culture. These well produced filmstrips will at least be helpful in providing background illustrations of Buddhist and Muslim places of worship.

The Buddhist strip concentrates on statues of the Buddha, temples, shrines and monasteries. We see the 2,200-year-old Sri Maha Bodhi tree, supposedly one under which the Buddha sat and taught and the temple which contains a tooth of the Buddha.

The Islamic filmstrip presents a varied and colourful succession of mosques, minarets and, of course, the Muezzin. We are shown the Blue Mosque and St Sophia's in Istanbul and mosques in such diverse places as Trinidad, Ghana, Kuala Lumpur and Jerusalem. A surprising number of the pictures in both strips are unpopulated.

However, the concise and informative notes that are supplied with each strip will allow the user to develop his own narrative commentary and questions. David Self

Community on the map

by Brian Hill

Longman's European Studies (Teacher's Set)
Published by Longman Group Ltd.
Designed and produced by SGS Associates (Education) Ltd.
Teacher's Guide by Patrick O'Connell
Price £2.25.

The teacher's set for Longman's European Studies is intended to help in the selection of material. It can be used as a basis for a two-year course for fourth and fifth year students, and it also claims to be useful in general studies for sixth formers and in the English department lower down the secondary school.

The set consists of a teacher's guide, a copy of The European Community in Maps and ten topic cards. The scheme requires the teacher to order subsequent topic cards in multiples of ten for each topic he wishes to develop. Extra cards cost £1.90 for each set.

The teacher's guide gives a list of school subjects to which topic cards can be linked and expands on further activities and points for discussion. The extensive extra resources list partly contradicts the claim that "each card is self-contained", however it is detailed and helpful. The author acknowledges assistance from the Centre for Contemporary European Studies at Sussex University, and includes many of their publications in the suggested reading section.

The maps are produced by the EEC's Information Department. There are 14, divided into five main categories; geographical aspects of the European Community; energy; working population and principal industries; transport; and the community in the world.

The maps are too small and detailed for class display. They have limited appeal for younger children, but sixth formers could use them as a basis for project work. The maps were printed in 1974 with most of the data referring to 1971, and some of the information such as coal production, spread of working population and tourist habits is out of date.

The academic style of the maps is not continued in the topic cards which have six sides of information, illustration and activities to appeal to the less-able pupil. The Longman European Studies series is at first sight highly complex and it is difficult to discipline the various topics into a coordinated pattern of study. However, the teacher's guide is helpful in suggesting a range of areas for development. It will be of most use as a stimulus generating its own work, rather than as a reinforcement for existing activities.

The reputation of Schools Council maths publications is such that any addition arouses keen expectation. This three-year project, culminating in the Early Mathematical Experience Pack, directed by Dr and Mrs G. Matthews, supported by six experienced team members and backed by a strong consultative committee, enjoyed the working cooperation of 84 pilot or associate groups. The specific aims were:

● By observing young children in the classroom to identify and classify experiences leading to mathematical ideas and to relate these to the growth of mathematical concepts;

● To use these findings to help teachers to further mathematical development in young children.

Notwithstanding the bibliography quoted, relatively little comparable research was available, and too often theoretical conjectures were overburdened with jargon, so the project groups built up their own collection of experiences. Essential element of growth in mathematical understanding repeatedly emerged from skilled observation and talking to children. The depth of meaning to a child of his mathematical experience became more firmly recognized as dependent upon "meaningful encounter" with an informed mind—that of a sympathetic, understanding adult.

The General Guide deals shrewdly with such experiences and advises on the use of the booklets. First priorities—such as the child's feeling of security—are always respected, but from the many ideas integral to his general activities the gradual isolation and eventual generalization of those essential to understanding maths must become a positive objective for the percipient teacher.

Attention is drawn to the value of the infant teacher thinking divergently—recognizing, for instance, the varied purposes and possibilities in different materials. The desirable involvement of parents is emphasized, and shared home activities with the child involving basic ideas in maths are amply illustrated. The Guide then concerns itself with the study of relationships, with concept growth and with clarifying less familiar mathematical terms essential to the teacher.

Each booklet presents two themes, all following the sequence of introduction, possible developments, teacher's role. The exposition is always clear—whether on extracting principles and developing mathematical vocabulary or describing practical procedures with helpful observations on equipment and its effective use. Frequently illuminating scraps of conversation with infants add force to the argument.

Many will gain fresh stimulus from this pack: capable infant teachers, already organizing activities of the quality described, could deepen their theoretical grasp; playgroup leaders would appreciate such a clear-cut lead and students gain unparalleled help from so authoritative a combination of theory and practice. Important, too—many parents would find the exposition intelligible, absorbing and convincing.

The slide pack and videotape, valuable aids for lecturers and advisers, will be available for review later on.

"Play the game, Taylor! That's the only copy of the TES we've got."

Every Friday go into your local newsagent, smile, produce 20p and ask for a copy of The Times Educational Supplement. This is how to avoid argument, injury and be the first to read the TES.

THE TIMES
Educational Supplement

The TES goes to work

THE TES NOW PROVIDES ON ITS "SCHOOL TO WORK" PAGE EACH WEEK, SPECIALIST NEWS COVERAGE OF THE DEVELOPING – AND CONTROVERSIAL – RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN EDUCATION AND INDUSTRY AND THE TRANSITION FROM SCHOOL TO WORK.

Industry and education need to know about each other. They also need to keep tabs on the rapidly growing activities of the agencies and organizations, public and voluntary, that deal with young people.

The "School to Work" page supplements the attention being paid throughout the paper to the needs and interest of industrial trainers, careers specialists, youth workers, and all those concerned with equipping the young for a full adult role.

The Times Educational Supplement's coverage of education has always been broad, and it has regarded industrial training and youth affairs as part of its field. In the past two years the growing national and professional concern has been reflected in the increased space and prominence given throughout the paper to these matters. The most important developments and initiatives by central government and others, such as the new national programme for school leavers, are often disclosed or foreshadowed in the TES before you can learn about them from any other source.

Education in a different dimension.

RAF officer
EDUCATION

A lot of educational jobs can be fairly predictable and routine. The job of an RAF Education Officer is neither of these.

Maybe we can tell you why.

In the first place an Education Officer in the RAF, whether a man or a woman, is in a very responsible position because the Service has a crucial job to do. The maintenance of the highest standards of training is imperative. Our existence might depend on it.

Secondly, there is the nature of the job itself. The RAF is a big organisation, of over 80,000 people. It is also a committed organisation. The people in it are there because they choose to be. As an educator you will find yourself dealing with people who really want to learn. Your work may range from the instruction of young apprentices to the tuition of university graduates undergoing officer training at an RAF college. At all levels it is a satisfying experience. Teaching, however, is only part of the job. You will also be dealing at management level with the organisation of further education at home and overseas and with the improvement of training courses and methods. This will involve administrative work in liaison with outside specialists and officers of all branches of the Service.

You will find the work most rewarding and a useful background for civilian teaching. If you are looking for a worthwhile job where your contribution is truly valued – give thought to the RAF.

You may choose to spend 4, 5 or 6 years in the RAF with a chance of longer engagement to the age of 38 or for 16 years. And, if you are considered good enough, there are opportunities for service to the age of 55.

If you are interested, post this coupon now to:
Group Captain T. R. Morgan RAF,
Officer Careers
London Road, Stanmore,
Middlesex HA7 4PZ.

Please send me information about a career as an Education Officer in the RAF.

Name ____________________

Address ____________________

Date of Birth __________ (Age limit 29½; exceptional candidates may be considered up to 39½)

With this coupon please enclose, in confidence, a brief curriculum vitae. You should be a graduate, preferably qualified to teach. Formal application must be made in the UK.

LONDON
PSYCHO-EDUCATION

The Richmond Fellowship College in association with the International Institute of Rehabilitation Studies Incorporated in Canada invite applications for the:

1978/9 SANDWICH COURSE IN PSYCHO-EDUCATION

Psycho-education is a programme of re-education of disturbed and delinquent children and young people which has been developed over the past 25 years by the School of Psycho-Education at the University of Montreal. The distinction between teaching and caring staff has been abolished and within the programme trained psycho-educators combine both roles and lead the young people through a four-stage programme—assimilation, control, creativity and personality development—in which every moment of each day is part of the therapeutic plan.

The London-based course provides an opportunity in the United Kingdom for those with relevant qualifications and experience to engage in a unique programme of study and practice designed to expose them to the techniques and theory of psycho-education.

BIRMINGHAM CITY COUNCIL

Theatre

April is the cruellest month, but...

Phillip Bergson at the Oxford Festival of Theatre

Under the portly patronage of that modern Pooh-Bah, Lord Goodman, and providentially underwritten by sponsorship from The Observer, the Oxford Festival of Theatre filled the first two weeks of University term with a bewildering variety of theatrical events, student and professional, ranging from stand-up revues to Iranian passion plays, with over two dozen productions of infinite diversity and a lively programme of workshops, seminars and talks centred in the Oxford Playhouse, and its adjoining Burton Rooms.

Daily bulletins of events kept aficionados informed of last-minute changes in schedule and it is no mean tribute to the administration that the Festival managed to gain more shows than it lost. It also attracted more substantial audiences as word-of-mouth gradually countered the largely ineffectual publicity and third-term apathy (April is the cruellest month for launching new ventures in Oxford and if you have got one you really have to flaunt it).

There were several sell-outs including Rowan Atkinson's opening cabaret Beyond a Joke and resident littérateur Francis Warner's latest play A Conception of Love, conceived especially for the Festival. That the most successful and the most interesting of the productions on show came from the city itself suggests that the jamboree might have been more appropriately styled a Festival of Oxford Theatre. Even so, the eclectic and strictly non-competitive selection, while not exploring any single themes or techniques, clearly proved that a new British festival of theatre could work and in such a culturally luxuriant hot-house as Oxford probably will, if it borrows from the Aldwych's much-missed World Theatre Seasons. Cooperation with the city's already extensive activities in music and cinema could provide an appetizing alternative to Edinburgh for art-lovers unwilling to trek North.

New drama rubbed shoulders unassumingly with known works and there was only a slightly uneasy mix of student and professional groups, performing anything from Webster to Poliakoff. Most were very promising, if not threatening (Phantom Captian's Loaded Questions consisted of precisely those, fired remorselessly at spectators) but the troupe lured from farthest away, Maia of Poznan University, disappointed me the most. Their second offering Arena was said to "deal with harmony and optimism, failure and struggle" but its energetic players' symbolic cavortings in untranslated Polish were not exactly communicative. The finale saw them falling among imported packing-cases: I left unenlightened.

A domestic return was at the heart of Doug Lucie's Oh Well presented by the Oxford University Dramatic Society. A more coherent expression of political fears, it combined naturalism (literally, kitchen-sink-side drama) and some engagingly funny dialogue with an expressionist approach to the backwater suburban ripples at a retirement-day party where domestic malice finds release in pre-election chat and squabbles about more serious kinds of parties. Remarkably well cast, it featured a splendid role for its highly talented author (until recently an undergraduate) as the Dad whose values have crumbled sufficiently with age to allow one of his sons to be an activist for the National Front, furthering policies which he had fought against in the War.

German Skerries, by Robert Holman from the Orbit Theatre Company, focused other eyes on the contemporary social and political scene, its main characters birdwatchers who meet on a Tyneside cliff-top. Again, gentle humour relieved the striking of platitudes.

More searing, cynical, satiric strokes characterized Copi's Eva Peron directed with flair—and relish—by David Gibson. The Fool's Theatre Company's vastly amusing version of the "death" of the Argentinian ex-president's wife, created an atmosphere of latent hatred that made Huis Clos look like a picnic spoilt by rain. In sober contrast, Goldsmiths' College's Leonce und Leona gave a worthy production of Buechner's tragi-comedy, in the original German, with colourful costumes diverting the non-specialist auditor.

If Richard Crane had performed his own monologue Gogol in Swahili it would still have impressed as a tour-de-force: the verbal athleticism of his maddening anti-hero confirmed the sensation that a Festival depends as much on the extremes of an individual's excellence as on the overall competence of ensemble work. In both areas the Oxford Theatre Festival has definitely made a good beginning.

A recent exhibition, Art for Whom? at the London Serpentine Gallery, attracted much comment, mostly critical, from art critics about jargon, relevance and innovation. Behind the discontent may have been a nagging awareness of the contradiction inherent in showing art designed for a social purpose in a gallery away from the community context which gives it meaning. But whatever the reason, one project which certainly deserves none of the strictures applied to the exhibition as a whole is the Laycock primary school project. Fortunately, this project has now found a better medium than a gallery for conveying its ideas.

A film, Dinosaurs in the Playground, has been commissioned by the Arts Council about the Laycock School Experiment with the aim of exciting people to the possibility of improving their school or local surroundings. It deserves to succeed.

In 1976 the playground of Laycock primary school was grim by any standards: a vast expanse of tarmac surrounded on three sides by factories. Its high soot-blacked walls offered little promise of imaginative undertakings, though inside the children's work on display and the classroom organization suggested extremely imaginative practices.

It was in that year that Roger Fagin and David Cashman, two art students, entered the school to begin a 2½-year scheme supported by the ILEA. Their aim was to put their skills at the service of the school to transform the exterior to the design of the pupils and also to involve parents and teachers. "To act as a catalyst in a community project", is how Cashman describes his role.

The artists began by asking the children to depict their school and its surroundings and to speculate in drawing, painting, models, writing and tape-recordings on how they would like them improved.

The next step was to paint murals on the front face of the school. David Cashman describes how the artists did not offer the children complete freedom to do what they wanted—rather we explained the limitations clearly. We emphasized that within those limitations anything was possible".

In the case of the murals, the children produced designs from which 16 were chosen, but the actual painting, which for the most part has to be undertaken from long ladders, was done by the art students following the children's designs exactly.

The next project was self-portraiture: more than 200 children drew round the shape of their body on the external walls of the school and then painted their own images.

A university plea was for things to climb. The children built de*tailed and elaborate scale models of* play structures using miniature car tyres and railway sleepers and elements of these models were used when art students and children put together the real thing with actual tyres and sleepers.

Other projects included a garden and the conversion of some redundant outside toilets into a ghost house: children made monster masks in class and performed with them to music behind a back projection screen. The shadow silhouettes were photographed and then used to paint images of ghosts on the interior walls.

The overall result, as this beauti*fully made film clearly shows*, is a metamorphosis. The drab playground and school buildings are transformed into an area in which children can have adventures and indulge their fantasies. Other playgrounds in the area, we are told, have been similarly changed.

The film does not go in depth into the problems of working collaboratively, nor does it tackle the obvious question of how this sort of work can be extended into the future: one pointer to the continuing success of such a scheme must be the extent to which the playground changes with each succeeding generation.

Dinosaurs in the Playground, however, puts up a convincing case for this kind of project in schools. The last word should go to the headmistress of Laycock primary school, Barbara Ryan. The project, she says, had become "much more than we had hoped for". The children got a more exciting playground, "but they have also written their signature on to their environment loudly and clearly and I think that that has affected them and their personali*ties in that it has made them feel* that what they have to say really does matter".

Choreographic Endeavour
16mm colour, sound, 40 minutes.

Choreography is eloquence of movement. We can all learn to stand, stretch and move with grace, and as schoolchildren most of us do. But few of us are yet so fortunate as to acquire a pleasant sense of poise and bodily command as part of a self-contained mental discipline rather than as a result of forcing the body to behave like a machine in competition.

For this reason alone Peter Bradford's modest documentary of choreographic classes for 16 to 18-year-old students at the Brooking Ballet School, London, deserves to be seen. The dozen or more students whose group training and individual work shown are as mixed a selection of physical types as one could imagine and their exercises are within the scope of any normally healthy youngsters. The movements are distinguished only by the care and self-sufficiency of the apprentice craftsman, not simply to move naturally and efficiently, but to discover and convey intention.

The conventional view, even among dancers, is that choreography is an art to be practised only after lengthy training and professional experience. There is also a general belief that choreography cannot be taught. It is an attitude Nesta Brooking does not share, and it is perhaps not surprising that her efforts to introduce students to balletic composition have been greeted with less than enthusiasm in some quarters.

However, the working relationship of Nesta Brooking and her teaching colleagues with their young apprentice choreographers makes an absorbing and persuasive case for her kind of cooperative approach at a stage when young minds are still supple and receptive to experienced guidance.

This guidance is not formulated in terms of set-piece dramatic anecdote. The basic exercises, a selection of which are demonstrated in the first part of the film, are concerned with harmonizing a mastery of specific gesture with its significance.

Formal exercises are interspersed with improvizations allowing a free play of mind and gestural association about a given topic. Here again, the topics are deliberately neutral: "a chair" or "a busy street" observed from the studio. Exercises and choreographic invention alike go hand in hand with music, most of it original, provided at the piano by the Brooking school's talented repetiteur, Norman Higgins, from time to time by a visiting flute or horn.

This is not an elaborately rehearsed film, indeed much of its compelling attraction lies in the informality with which we can observe teachers and students in normal training, thinking aloud, practising, making mistakes, correcting themselves. The camera moves little and observes much, not cutting from detail to detail, but persuasively and respectfully attentive to the action on screen.

The use of film as a teaching medium is fruitful not only as documentation and demonstration but also, like tape recording for young musicians, as a valuable feedback of progress in training. Choreographic Endeavour has much to offer to a developing school curriculum increasingly attentive to the relationship of music, dance and theatre, and to cultural achievement in general. Equally important, it demonstrates that film documentation can be successfully achieved on a budget: the two parts were produced for about £4,000 last year.

Home from home?

Frances Farrer

Kent County Council are closing down their children's homes and finding as many foster parents as they can for the children in their care. This is partly for economic reasons and partly because they think that genuine family homes are better for the kids than institutions, however humanely run.

This Week (Thames, May 4) seemed to agree, with very few reservations. In their programme on Care the Reverend Nic Stacey, director of Kent Social Services, said that while children are put into homes for their own good the effect is often to accentuate the "deprivation cycle" and start them on a slippery slope to supervision order/remand/Borstal/prison.

Alderden community home was featured as an example of good institutional care but the children had some adverse comments. "We got no one to tell secrets to", "There's too many kids here and the house is too big", "Can't get used to it". The Superintendent, Arnold Davies, says he looks forward to a day when Alderden can be closed. "If every kid was going to where they could get love and care in a small family unit, my job would be done."

Of course there are a great many problems: Care mentioned only a few. A lot of children are difficult to foster and some are regarded as unfosterable. The effect on the foster family can be extremely disruptive, while for the child being fostered, adjustments to the new family and visits to the natural one are hard to make. All this was clearly shown, but the selection of foster parents and matching with foster children, failed relationships, economics, delinquency, training for jobs, were skated over. This said, Care gave an honestly biased account of a policy with which it sympathized, and that is something to be grateful for.
